Mr. CROZIER. The provision would stand then, if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois should prevail, without any time fixed in the law. He proposes to strike out the words, "or who has suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days." That forty days, of course, relates to the preceding portion of the amendment also.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend will pardon me once again. I do not wish to interrupt him, but only to call his attention to the form of this section, which, it seems to me, he entirely overlooks, in the effect he ascribes to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. Here is a proposition to substitute bodily a section for another section, and of course to blot out the existing section, of which this is to take the place. Now, if, in making your substituted section, you omit, as the Senator from Illinois now proposes to do, all men whatever, merely because they are delinquent in respect to their matured commercial paper, be it for fourteen days or forty, the effect manifestly is to withdraw from the causes of compulsory bankruptcy such an act as is described. That is the object of the Senator from Illinois. Now, my friend from Kansas treats it as if the effect of it was merely to strike out the forty days, and let it go back to the fourteen days, and leave it there. On the contrary, I submit to him that the effect would be just what the mover of the amendment means, namely, to strike out from among the classes of persons whose acts subject them to proceedings of compulsory bankruptcy, those men who have committed no fault except that for fourteen days or forty days, or any other length of time, their commercial paper, after maturity, has gone unpaid.

Mr. LOGAN. That class is entirely withdrawn from the effect of the law.

Mr. CONKLING. That is all there is of it, if this amendment prevails.

Mr. CROZIER. I do not think the Senator from New York understands the point I make on this section.

Mr. CONKLING. Perhaps not.

Mr. CROZIER. The law as it stands now, and which I read, includes the word "fraudulently"—"and who being a banker, merchant, or trader, has fraudulently stopped or suspended payment," &c., for fourteen days. I stated that the courts had construed that clause so as to include men who had stopped from inability to pay.

Mr. CONKLING. So I understand the Senator. Now we propose to strike out the whole of that section and put in nothing except what shall remain in this section. If the Senator from Illinois succeeds in striking out of this section everything on that subject, then I ask the Senator from Kansas do we not have a section of a statute which will entirely omit the class of persons to whom he is referring?

Mr. CROZIER. I submit to the Senator from New York that the language of the amendment is precisely the language of the original act, and if the language of that act was construed so as to include men who failed to pay on account of inability, the construction that will be given to this clause in the amendment if left here would be the same. The law now applies to a man who "has fraudulently stopped payment." Suppose it stopped there, what would be the construction the courts would give to it? I insist they would give it the same construction they gave to the original act. "Fraudulently stopped payment" would include men who stopped payment from inability, who stopped for a day, if the Senator chooses, if this clause is stricken out of the amendment. The courts construe that to mean any stoppage of payment that a man can conceive of for fourteen days, and if the same language is left in this act, why will not the courts so construe it again as to include men who fail to pay from inability?

It seems to me that, taking the two clauses together, this one that I have read and the one that is proposed to be stricken out, they would amount to this: that if for any reason other than a fraudulent reason the debtor fails to pay, the time is extended to forty days; he must be a delinquent before he can be adjudged a bankrupt. If you strike this out, then, under the construction given to the original act, with precisely this language, he may be put into bankruptcy the next day after he has failed to pay for the very best reasons and no fraud intended. It seems to me that would be the construction of the language if left as the Senator from Illinois proposes to leave it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if my friend from Kansas will pardon me, I will explain to him that in reading from Brightly he has not read the law as it now stands.

Mr. CROZIER. Is it not printed right?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is printed right, but he has read from the print of the original law, which has since been amended. The law as it now stands and has stood for three or four years is that the men who, being bankers, &c., without going over the whole list of their names, stop payment of their commercial paper without fraud are the subjects of bankruptcy; that is, that is taken to be prima facie evidence of a case of insolvency; but that stoppage of paper of the honest people who do not stop fraudulently must continue, by the law as it now stands, for fourteen days, or, as we propose to make it, forty days. That is taken as evidence that the man, although he is honest, is unable to go on with his business and meet his engagements; and then it proceeds, as the whole law does, upon the idea that if he is in that condition that he cannot go on with his ordinary business and meet his engagements after a period of forty days of trying to pick up and get righted again, then it is a case where the creditors have a right to say, as without the bankrupt law they would have a right to say at the instant, only each one seizing for himself, "You must turn your property over to pay your debt." Without this law giving the forty days to the bankrupt who is innocent and who has not stopped fraudulently, as the law now stands, (for my friend was reading from the first original passage of the act,) the law says to the creditors, "You cannot take his property either by State law or national law for a period of forty days, so as to do you any good, because if you take it by the State law, at the end of the forty days prescribed the other creditors can move, or the debtor can move himself at any time, and you cannot get a dishonest and unjust advantage by seizing it all for yourself, to the exclusion of everybody else and breaking up the debtor," which would be just as bad as if it were done under the bankrupt law, and a great deal worse from the fact that in that case he does not get a discharge but has the balance of his debts hanging around his neck all the time. That is that view of it.

So this law as it now stands, and as we propose it—we only change the time; we do not change the substance—declares that where a man has gone on in commercial business and has failed to meet his engagements he shall have a grace, not according to the old law merchant of three days on sight-bills, but a grace of forty days; and we say in effect to his creditors, "You shall not press him under State law; you shall not threaten and get out of him a preference to yourselves by any contrivance; but you shall all wait for forty days in order to let this poor debtor, who is honest, see if he cannot retrieve himself in such a way as to go on." Then when the forty days go by, if he cannot do it in that time—and, of course, I admit that is an arbitrary limit; you might say thirty-nine, you might say forty-one; you have got to fix some reasonable time—we say, "You, having failed after forty days to be able to carry on your business any longer, the law takes hold of it and does what but for this law every creditor might have done under the State laws at the very instant and destroyed you at once;" and then instead of there being the race of diligence, as it is sometimes called, but as I call it the race of avarice and dishonesty, every creditor grasping in order that he may get all and the next man get nothing if there is not enough for all, they shall all come in and have an equal division of the estate. That is all. We only say to the debtor that we will carry out, as best we may, the obligation which justice imposes upon him to pay his debts, which without a bankrupt law, or with it, is an obligation that I hope will never be denied, because it involves morality, it involves honesty, it involves every virtue which is to make a state prosperous and happy. We cannot contrive by legislation to relieve debtors from the payment of their debts with entire absoluteness and freedom, and say there shall be no law for the payment of debts at all, except you declare that there shall be no credit; that nobody shall buy anything unless he buys for cash; that there shall be no debts, and nobody shall ever owe anybody. But if you say there is to be a credit, then in some form or other you must say that the debtor shall pay according to his stipulation. The State laws do say everywhere, and the United States laws outside of the bankruptcy provision say everywhere, that the debtor shall meet his engagement; and if he fails for an hour the motion of the law is put in force against him by his creditor, who demands only, as Shylock did, as my friend from Illinois says, according to the letter of the law, that the debtor shall pay according to his engagement by the giving up of his property under the proper processes to dissolve the obligation. The bankrupt law simply steps in upon that state of things and says that when a trader, a merchant, who trades in all States and in all countries, comes honestly into this unfortunate condition that he cannot meet his engagements for this length of time, instead of there being this confusion of remedies and this collision of creditors, each endeavoring to grasp full payment for himself, when justice only requires that he should take a fair dividend from the estate as if the man had died, so that all may be treated alike, then instead of making this grasping seizure by numerous suits, one in one State and another in another, wherever a man can grasp the debtor's property, all the creditors shall submit to one common tribunal, and the debtor shall perform his obligation as far as he may by appropriating the property which but for this law the creditors might have seized long before and destroyed him and left him with the balance about his neck—they may take this property, dispose of it according to law for their equal advantage and benefit; and then, if the debtor has been honest, the law proceeds to declare that he shall be freed.

What system of legislation, consistent with morals and with justice and mercy at the same time, can you devise better than that? It provides for giving up everything to the creditors; but it provides that the selfishness of one creditor shall not be gratified at the expense of the rest, and it provides as to the debtor for this period that under the provisions of State laws the selfishness of the creditor shall not be brought to bear to ruin the debtor in the mean time, and to prevent his exercising for his own benefit and that of his creditors the diligence that he may in forty days to reinstate himself and go on with his business. Is not that just? Can you better state it, Mr. President, than that—that on one side it represses the avarice and the greed of the creditor; on the other side it stimulates the debtor to honesty and diligence to endeavor in that time to retrieve himself and go on; and even after a proceeding has commenced, at the end of forty days, if when the hearing comes on he can show that the paper that has been suspended and not paid is disputed paper, or can show that it lay over that time through any misapprehension as to an agreement for an extension, then he is not a bankrupt, but goes on again? If he can show, it being a case where he ought to have paid it, that he has been able in forty days to raise the money and to pay it, then he is not a bankrupt, and he is dismissed to his own affairs. What can be more fair and just than that?

So, I repeat, without prolonging this discussion, that it seems to me to strike out this provision is to give a severe blow to the honest debtor class of the community.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, I have no disposition to say anything further on the pending amendment, and if no other Senator wishes to be heard upon it, I will call for the yeas and nays upon it. Before the vote is taken, however, allow me to say a few words in conclusion.

My legislative experience, I find, has not been of sufficient duration to preserve my judgment and my feeling from the seductive effects of the eloquence, logic, and clearness of the honorable Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I feel that he is quite earnest, and that he is quite sure that he is right in the amendment that he has proposed to the existing bankrupt law, and that he is honestly struggling to meet the demands of the country for a national bankrupt law.

The purpose I originally had in view in speaking on this subject yesterday was to assist in that direction as best I might the efforts of the Judiciary Committee to fix upon the statute-books of the nation a proper bankrupt law. But, sir, to my mind, if we may refer to the legislative proceedings of the other branch of the national Congress, it is evident that the national bankrupt law is in peril, and is about to be absolutely swept out of existence. The occasion of the pending amendments of the Judiciary Committee is the fact that a bill is now before us from the House of Representatives for the total repeal of the law. As I said yesterday, and repeat to-day, personally I prefer that we should have a bankrupt law. While I respect and shall obey the instructions of the Legislature of the State of Illinois when they shall come here, I ventured to say yesterday, and I repeat now, that if I had a personal preference upon the subject it would have been that they had passed no such instructions. I hope the day will come when the people of the United States will accustom themselves to believe that a general bankrupt law is a wise, national, and just policy. Now that I feel that it is in peril, and is about to be swept away, I thought I could do no more judicious thing than to propose an amendment here, that would strike from the pending amendment as well as from the existing law that odious feature in it which has so much stirred up and moved the people of a very large portion of the country.

It is not a wise course, I apprehend, for a legislator to lay down a general course of action, or to attempt to pass laws upon mere individual instances of hardship represented to him by a constituent here or a constituent there. I find that that would not be a safe line of public conduct to pursue. The appeals that have been made personally to me have been against this feature of the existing law. Again and again I have been piteously appealed to to aid in striking it from the bankrupt law. If I had no other and higher motive, or if I could be controlled by no other and different motive than that, I would promptly vote for the repeal of the whole law; but it is not wise perhaps to frame a man's course of public conduct according to the circumstances or the sufferings of individuals; and looking at in that higher and broader sense, as it comes down to us from the framers of the Constitution, I can see the wisdom that provided that we should establish uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. I could very well believe that it would be a wise thing to have a uniform system, penetrating every State of the Union, and to that extent superseding and abolishing our State insolvent laws; but when I find a feature in the statute that is regarded as a hard one; when I find multitudes of business men—upright, honest, splendid men—struck at because they stand under intimidation and threat, on the right and the left, that they will be utterly destroyed because they cannot meet their outstanding obligations for a specified number of days; when I find that feeling prevailing extensively in the West, and somewhat in the East, too, it seems to me that it is good and wise legislation to amend the law so as to get rid of that one feature. Let the remainder of these provisions stand upon the statute-book until the people of the United States, year after year, shall become acquainted with them, and finally agree with as much unanimity to the existence and provisions of a general bankrupt law as they have agreed to a revenue law for the collection of taxes or for the collection of duties upon imports.

Now, we must go slowly. Will the Judiciary Committee, or will the friends of this measure, that extends the number of days to forty, peril the passage of the law by standing for this one provision? Would it not be wiser to let it go, and thus meet that cry against it largely in the West, largely in the South, and somewhat also in the East?

I do not wish to be understood as standing here, even under the instructions of my own State impending over my head, as an opponent or an enemy of a wise, judicious, and just bankrupt law; such a one as the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] defined yesterday and asserted he would favor, and ending his remarks by saying that this was such a one, and, so far as he was concerned, he would favor this one. I, too, desire to be understood here and at home as favoring a just, wise, and constitutional, but liberal, bankrupt law, to which our people shall in time become accustomed; and then, as we shall become more highly educated and understand what credit means, and the complicated and delicate relations existing between the debtor and creditor, and find out what shall be the medium of equity as well as the medium of justice between them, to frame a bankrupt law that will meet the universal consent, and that will stand year after year in all time as a just and wise law.

But now the existing act is threatened with repeal. There is no unanimity of sentiment in the country in favor of it; it is yet in a debatable position; and while it is in this position before us, I think, in the interest of a just law and to meet the necessities of the people of the West, it would be wise to adopt the amendment that I have proposed and to strike out the words in the thirty-ninth, fortieth, and forty-first lines of the seventh section.

One word further, sir, if I may be allowed to depart from the general principle of the amendment that I have suggested, for I am not going into the whole theory and all the reasoning and history of the bankrupt laws or of bankruptcy. I do not wish to tread upon ground with which I am not very familiar. I am not inclined to expose myself to be picked up and captured and carried away into oblivion because I am expatiating upon a subject that I do not very well understand. I mean to go slowly, very slowly, and to be always as nearly right as I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator departs from the particular point he was on, if I do not interrupt him, I wish to call his attention to a point he has omitted respecting this specific amendment as being still hard upon the debtor if this clause is not stricken out, that we have provided in another place, as he will see, that the debtor, if he does fail for forty days, must yet be in such a condition that one-fourth of his creditors in number and one-third in amount must concur in the opinion that his affairs ought to be wound up before he can be hung up in bankruptcy for this suspended paper of his.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will be frank enough to admit to the honorable Senator that if the amendment I have proposed shall fail, the amendment that his committee proposes here is a great advance upon the law as it was, a very excellent improvement upon the law as it was, and will be so accepted universally. But upon this question of the limitation of fourteen days or forty days, it has been asked this morning, and I think very wisely, who shall venture to fix the number of days in which an honest banker, an honest trader, an honest merchant, an honest manufacturer, or an honest miner, shall be thrown out of a just and honorable employment and cast into disgrace? Sir, the West, from the top of the Alleghany Mountains to the Coast Range on the Pacific, is dotted over with men of small means, men of limited capital, who are struggling for honest competition in trade, who are trying to-day to build themselves up, to build up the wealth of the West, to introduce among our people the arts and manufactures that will bring us more wealth in time than we have ever yet had. While those men are struggling on the mountains and plains of the West to start in this honorable career, I would not throw a straw in their way. I would not, because they fail to meet a just debt or a dozen just debts at the end of forty days, put them in the position of being thrown into bankruptcy even by one-fourth in number of their creditors or by three-fourths in the value of the property. There would still be a risk; there would still be a peril. I would rather for the present time that that feature of the law were stricken out and that we should pursue that class of men who were doing business unjustly, iniquitously, corruptly, who by all the devious channels and devious ways concocted by vice and villainy would shirk the just payment of a just debt. That class of men I would pursue with a bankrupt law or any other law. I shall not be found standing in this Senate advocating to any extrent or for one moment any act of a debtor that would shirk his just responsibility.

Now, we propose to fix this period at forty days. How many days has it been since the 18th of September last? Forty days passed away from that day, and there was not one man in ten able to pay his commercial paper. Forty days more passed away, and we stood in the West, as we stand yet, with bated breath as to whether these men shall go under or not. Still another forty days have gone by, one hundred and twenty days have passed away, and no Senator can feel safe in saying that the honest trader, banker, manufacturer, merchant, or miner of the West can meet his commercial paper to-day. A crisis overtakes the country, and it is in such a crisis, in a panic, when the public heart is thrown off its balance, when men are wild from the results of speculation, or possibly, of overtrading, that you propose to put upon them the clamps of a bankrupt law. Sir, when there is no panic, when we are going along smoothly and easily, forty days might answer; one hundred would answer better; fourteen days, to some extent, have answered; but then there are but few men to be reached by such a law as this. When a crisis comes, and the country is beset with a panic, men are alarmed and terrified, and the ungracious creditor says to the helpless debtor, "If you do not settle my account of one hundred, or five hundred, or three thousand dollars, I will, at the end of fourteen days, or forty days, force you into bankruptcy; I will sacrifice all your bills receivable; I will confiscate all your estate for the benefit of your creditors;" and the man is in such a condition that he is not absolutely capable of carrying on business as a disinterested and fair-minded man should.

If the Senate will strike out this feature, and send this bill to the other House thus amended, with all the other wise provisions that I concede the amended bill contains, and the assent of that House shall be given to the bill, we shall have a national bankrupt law. True, this class of men, consisting of four or five or six different species of business men, who may be compelled to go into bankruptcy, will be stricken from it; they will be removed from the law, and it will stand as a perfect bankrupt law, and there will be no objection to it. I can conceive of no just objection that will be urged to it anywhere. The panic may pass away. It is very pleasant for me to announce here to-day, what is not new at all, that the West is recovering, that money is getting a little easier, that the prospect looks brighter than it did one hundred and twenty days ago, that men are getting more hopeful, that trade is getting back into its accustomed channels, that there is a disposition to ride over this chasm, and we will ride over it triumphantly, beautifully, and grandly, and sail on in the future as we have in past years, I doubt not, nor does any Senator here doubt.

Now, sir, as I suppose no other Senator cares to say anything on this subject, I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this amendment goes to the very substance of this bill. It proposes to exempt bankers, brokers, merchants, traders, manufacturers, and miners from being put into bankruptcy by reason of their suffering their paper to remain suspended for weeks, months, and years. The non-payment for years of their paper is, under this amendment, to be no evidence of bankruptcy. This is converting the law merely into one against fraud, and our State laws make sufficient provision against that evil.

The amendment destroys to the creditor all the benefit of the law because the debtor, not being considered a bankrupt, can make preferences, can confess judgments, and dispose of his property. Of course in such a law there is no benefit to the creditor.

It destroys, too, the benefit of the law to the debtor. The creditor, the Shylock, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] considers him, can take judgment and issue execution, sell the property, and leave the debtor with a burden of indebtedness pressing him down like an incubus. If he ever again attempts to engage in business he must do so under a feigned name, as an agent, or by some shape of fraudulent contrivance.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] tells us that the honest debtors of the West have for one hundred and twenty days since the panic been struggling to survive and to recover from their embarrassments, and are succeeding. Why, sir, but for the existence of this bankrupt law they would have been ruined, their property would have been seized under execution, and all hope of recovery gone. It is the existence of the bankrupt law that has saved them. The creditor would not sue because any sale under execution would, by this law, be set aside, and the property of the debtor equally distributed. This law has enabled them to recover.

Further, sir, this amendment destroys the advantages of the bankrupt law to the public. The public benefit of the bankrupt law (and this constitutes its greatest value) is that it prevents overtrading. If the merchant knows that if he does not pay his paper he must surrender his business and his property be equally divided among his creditors, he will be very careful not to contract obligations that he cannot meet; but if the debtor knows that his paper (according to this amendment) may lie over for forty days or forty months and he cannot be disturbed, he will go into new speculations, shifting his indebtedness from one creditor to another, in the vain hope that by some happy stroke of fortune he may recover a prosperous condition.

And what reason is given for an amendment so destructive to the purposes of this law? Why, sir, we are told that the West are not a commercial people, and that they have not habits of prompt payment. As to the first reason, I most respectfully submit that the people of the West sell their produce and purchase manufactures, and have as much to profit by a just bankrupt law as the people of the East. As for the other reason, that they are not prompt in meeting their promises to pay, let me suggest to my friend that he is certainly legislating in the wrong direction. If his reason be true, then it is the interest of the West that our legislation should be directed to promote, rather than to weaken, commercial integrity and honor. A bankrupt law must be uniform; and the law must be adjusted for the benefit of those who are prompt, rather than for those who are lax, in payment.

Mr. President, I have heard it said here that no one gets any dividends from bankrupts' estates. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] used that argument against the bill. I ask the Senator, as a lawyer long in practice, whether, in his experience, it is not true that in the collection of debts against insolvents, that is against those whose debts are more than their assets, the aggregate amount of costs that he has received has not equaled or approximated the amount that he has collected for his clients? You can get judgment, but cannot collect debts of insolvents. And the great benefit of the bankrupt law is not in affording the machinery for the collection of bad debts, but it is that it prevents the contraction of bad debts by preventing overtrading.

Further, sir, we cannot have a voluntary bankrupt law for the benefit of debtors unless we also make provision for the benefit of creditors. Experience shows that in all countries four-fifths of those who engage in commercial pursuits end their career by failure. The prosperity of this country depends upon the energy of its active men, and it is of the first importance that we should have this emancipation of men who have been unfortunate in business. Those who framed our Constitution saw this. They saw that it was the interest of this country that the citizen should not be pressed down hopelessly with a burden of debt, but that he should be relieved that the country might avail itself of his energy.

Again, sir, no one can approve of preferences among creditors in the distribution of the estates of debtors. The creditors all contributed to its accumulation, and should share equally in its division. Equality is as valuable a principle in jurisprudence as it is in politics. Give us a law that will equally distribute the assets of the debtor among his creditors, whether the dividend be more or less.

This amendment, for the reasons which I have thus briefly stated, would destroy the benefits and advantages sought by the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. With all respect to the honorable Senator who proposes this amendment, I trust it will not prevail, and I beg leave to state very briefly the grounds of my opposition to it.

All bankrupt laws are founded in public policy. They grow out of the wants and necessities of commerce, and they are intended to promote the public good and the great ends of trade. The voluntary provisions of our bankrupt law are intended to benefit those honest but unfortunate people who are engaged in business, speculations, and adventures, and have honestly failed. The purpose is to take what they have, deliver it to their creditors, and turn them loose, so that they may begin the race of industry and enterprise again.

The involuntary feature is intended not so much to benefit the debtor as it is to benefit commerce, trade, and industry, in their broadest sense. In that view I think this clause, not exactly as it stands now, for reasons that I may advert to presently, ought to be retained with some modifications. The object of this clause is to prevent hazardous, adventurous men from engaging in commercial and industrial pursuits and incurring debts with no reasonable prospect of paying them at their maturity, thus deranging, impairing, and in some measure destroying the convenience of trade.

Why, sir, I think the late panic could be traced to causes that this very clause in the bill is intended to remedy and prevent. A private banker, for example, has debts that ramify the whole country. He lives in some commercial city; he has banking transactions with Maine, California, Alabama, Louisiana, and all the States. His debts have gone out; they go to make up very much of the commercial transactions of the country. Negligently, or by incurring responsibilities that he is not prepared to meet, he has gone on and increased the volume of his business until he finds that it is impossible to meet the paper that he has thrown out into the commercial world. What is the result? His paper matures; it is in every locality; it is in everybody's hands; it is announced that he has suspended; that he cannot pay; the result is a panic, or if it does not amount to thati great derangement of business and very general distress in the business world. This provision, as I understand it, is intended to prevent an evil of this sort; not only to remedy the evil, but to prevent it. This banker, if this provision of the bankrupt law were hanging over him, would see that if he allowed his debts to increase beyond his ability to pay, and he allowed them after they matured to remain past due for forty days, a sufficient percentage of his creditors could come along and put him into bankruptcy and wind him up, and that would be an end of it. He would therefore be cautious not to increase the volume of his business beyond his capacity to pay. He would be the more vigilant, when he had incurred these obligations, to make provision to meet his paper when it came due; and if a trader or such persons as are described in this clause of the bill shall recklessly incur such obligations as he cannot meet, a commercial community does not want him; he is not useful to the business industry of the country, and he ought to be put into bankruptcy, wound up, and turned out of the business classes.

I am aware of the evils that the honorable Senator from Illinois has adverted to, and they grow out of the fact that while in one section of our country we are highly commercial, in another we are mainly agricultural and producing. It seems to me, therefore, that some provision should be incorporated into this bill that would save small dealers in all the classes that are mentioned in the bill from the operation of the clause in question; but I do not think that the whole provision ought to be stricken out, for it would encourage reckless traders and those large and hazardous banking establishments that ramify the whole country with their paper, then fail in business, and make general ruin. Such dangerous men the country ought to be protected against. They are those who bring panics and general distress upon the community.

For these reasons I trust that the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] will not prevail, and if his amendment shall not prevail, I trust that the one suggested by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will be adopted—or some one like it.

Mr. BOREMAN. I merely wish to inquire of the chairman, if this amendment prevails, whether the fraudulent stopping of the payment for a day will not put all this class of persons into bankruptcy?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. It would leave it upon the pure fraud alone; and the failure to pay alone by an honest debtor would leave him exposed, without the protection of the bankrupt law—if there is any in it, as I think there is—to the attack of the creditor at once; whereas if he was a fraudulent debtor, striking this out, he would not be exposed to the creditor at once under the State laws of helping himself entirely and leaving the rest out in the cold, but would have to go through the process of bankruptcy, making a discrimination, as I understand it, in favor of the fraudulent and against the honest debtor.

Mr. BOREMAN. Is it intended that the fraudulent debtors shall be a separate class from those who are included within what is proposed to be stricken out? It reads, after enumerating—

> Or who, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment, or who has stopped or suspended, and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are two distinct classes; but it may happen that the fraudulent debtor has stopped for that period of time or not. He can be proceeded against at once. It may happen that the man who has suspended for fourteen or forty days will turn out to be a person who has committed fraud. He may possess both qualities. But if you strike out this provision entirely, then you strike all of the honest people who fail to meet their paper, and leave them without what we consider to be the valuable protection of the bankrupt law, against being crowded by their creditors in the mean time.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to discuss this matter any further, but I dislike to have it left in this position. If I understand the Senator from West Virginia, the impression made upon his mind is that the striking out of the class mentioned from the operation of the bankrupt law would leave them to a severer test of some other kind that I do not understand, probably under the State law, as the Senator from Vermont says. Now, if I understand the object of this amendment, and I think I do, it is to strike out from the bankrupt law entirely that class, so that they shall not be affected by the bankrupt law in any way whatever. It takes out the class who may be made bankrupts by reason of their having failed to pay for forty days, and leaves in the bankrupt law, then, subject to its provisions, those who have corruptly or fraudulently failed to pay. It leaves the bankrupt law applicable to the fraudulent debtors, and leaves the others out. That is the meaning of it precisely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it exactly, Mr. President. If this clause stands in, and an honest debtor fails to meet his paper at the day, he cannot successfully be proceeded with, either under the State law or the bankrupt law, until the expiration of the forty days, because the creditor proceeding the next day to sue would gain no advantage by it except being obliged to pay his own costs at the end of forty days. If you strike this out, you then say to every honest debtor, "You must take care of yourself against the rapacity of your creditors without any protection at all; that is to say, you can be sued the next day by every one of your creditors separately where there is overdue paper or accounts, or anything that you owe, and your property seized by a dozen different sheriffs in parcels and the whole of your estate eaten up; whereas if you could oblige them to wait for the forty days required by this law, you might be able to restore yourself and put yourself in order; or if you did not and were still unable to go on, there would be a fair distribution of your property among your creditors, and the few grasping and avaricious ones, who would drive you to the wall in a moment if they could, are not to take it all, but it is to be fairly divided among your creditors, and then you can get a discharge." That is the difference.

Mr. LOGAN. The argumentation of the Senator from Vermont I think has no parallel. He argues that if you strike out this provision you leave the debtor to the rapacity of his creditors; they may all sue him if it is stricken out; as much as to say if it is left in they cannot sue him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, do we not know that this will not debar them from prosecuting as many suits as they have a mind to do? Leaving this provision in does not prohibit the creditors from suing him. It only means that if they undertake to put him into bankruptcy, they can do it at the end of forty days. I leave it to my friend from Vermont if that is not true. The idea that this bankrupt bill bars a man from having suit brought against him is certainly something that I had not understood before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend means to be candid, as I have no doubt he does——

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, I do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then he does not state the proposition fairly at all. It is technically true that the party may be sued at the next moment; but every man who brings a suit brings it for his own interest; creditors act for their selfish interests. Now, with this clause left in, I repeat to my honorable friend, the creditor who within the forty days sues the debtor and undertakes to get a preference for himself, and to get his pay in spite of all the others, is told by this law, "You cannot complete that performance to the fraud of the creditors, because at the end of the forty days the other creditors can apply for a bankruptcy, and your attachment will be set aside; and there is not time enough in the forty days for you to get your judgment, and levy, and get your pay, and therefore your suing your debtor is a perfectly useless proceeding, which only leaves you to pay your own costs." That is what I mean when I say that this clause protects the debtor from being sued by his creditors for forty days. It does, in substance, protect him from being sued by them with any purpose of securing their own interests.

Mr. LOGAN. It indirectly does what the Senator says; but that it bars a suit, or prevents the bringing of a suit, is not a fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; I say not.

Mr. LOGAN. And if these creditors proceed under some of the State laws by attachment, the distribution of property is the same as it is under the bankrupt law; so that the Senator's argument in reference to the protection of a debtor is not good in this respect. The object of this amendment is not to place them in the position that the Senator suggests by any means, but it is for their protection; that a man shall not be made a bankrupt against his consent, when he is an honest man.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President I am rather indifferent on this whole question of bankruptcy. In fact hitherto I have been inclined to think that a system of bankruptcy was not congenial to our institutions or to our condition as a people. Although the Constitution contemplates it, I doubt extremely whether it is applicable to a country situated as we are, as a matter of principle. It originated in the necessities of a strictly commercial community. I do not think it was ever designed to be, or is in fact, applicable to a country situated as we are—with such an extent of territory, such a diversity of population, and of communities so self-sustaining, and self-supporting, and self-governing as the various American communities associated under our common Constitution are.

For these reasons, in a general way, I have never favored a system of bankruptcy. Being in the Senate when the original law now proposed to be amended was passed, I opposed it, or, rather, I failed to vote for it; I do not think I offered any special opposition to it.

There is only one consideration that under any circumstances would induce me to vote for it now; and that is, that any system or almost any law, good, or even bad, or indifferent, if it be permanent, so that the people know what it is and work up to it and are governed by it, is better than uncertainty, instability; and the latter has characterized the legislation of Congress upon the subject of bankruptcy under the Constitution. As I understand, all the laws which have been passed on that subject hitherto have not come up to the constitutional contemplation of a bankrupt system, such as was known to the framers of the Constitution. Sometimes they have been simply insolvent laws, the purpose of which manifestly was to free the debtor class, and that being done, the law had accomplished its object and was repealed. Such, I think, has been the history of bankrupt legislation in this country. To my mind nothing could be more vicious than that as a principle of legislation, and I am sure it is the experience of the American people that nothing has been more vicious and unjust than this whole class of legislation. Still we have had these laws, and my belief is that we shall have legislation upon the system of bankruptcy, as contemplated in some sense, or at least as authorized by the Constitution; and therefore I have made up my mind on the whole that it is better, as we have the law, to continue it in some modified form. Undoubtedly the present law should undergo very material modifications, but I am not perfectly advised as to that point.

Now one word on the question immediately before the Senate; and that is the provision which declares the non-payment of a debt within a particular time after it is overdue an act of bankruptcy. In any just sense, I ask the Senator from Vermont, who has the charge of this bill, was it ever known in any system of bankruptcy anterior to the date of the Constitution of the United States that such an act as that was an act of bankruptcy. Was the mere fact of non-payment, without any circumstance attending to show any dishonesty or any attempt to evade liability, with an abundance of resources lying back possibly, ever declared, in any system of bankruptcy antedating the Constitution of the United States, an act of bankruptcy, in and of itself?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I answer my honorable friend unhesitatingly in the affirmative, and I declare that the French law of bankruptcy, which I hold in my hand, provided for that exact thing, not after a period of fourteen days or forty days, but after the dishonor not only of commercial paper, but of any debt that the trader, or the manufacturer, or the man of merchandise owes. My friend can see it for himself.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the date of that act?

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the French Commercial Code, which had its origin back as far as the seventeenth century. Here it is all consolidated, and my friend can have it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How was it in the English system?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will come to that. I will make a full answer to my friend.

Then when you come to Belgium, or the separation of Belgium from Holland in 1830 (which my friend will remember by the way it took place, on account of the singing of the French Marseillaise at an opera-house one night)—in that commercial country the law was exactly the same, founded on the French Code of Commerce, which provided that if the trader or the merchant or whatever the class of people were who were put into bankruptcy in those days, but including these two certainly, failed to pay at the day, he then fell under the head of the men who were to be proceeded against by proceedings in bankruptcy almost exactly like those we have now in that respect; and then it went on to provide that if, in addition to failing to pay, there were circumstances of negligence or waste on the part of the debtor, it was a misdemeanor, for which he was punished by fine; and then it provided in the third place that if the case was still more aggravated, and he had been guilty of fraudulently concealing or putting his property out of the way in order to avoid his creditors, that was a still higher crime, for which he received a still greater punishment.

So, then, in the code of every continental country that is a commercial country and has a code of bankruptcy, from the first, the failure of the honest man to meet his engagements was the act to which the law looked as entitling his creditors, to prevent frauds between themselves and preferences between themselves and to deal justly to all, to move in common against the estate of that debtor to have it wound up; and they were so hard then against the debtor even that under these circumstances a full payment of all the assets that he had did not discharge him in the end; he must bring an individual release from every creditor; he could not be discharged by the operation of law; it only released his person from imprisonment, much like the present insolvent debtors' law, as we know.

Then when you come to England, it stood in two forms; there were two provisions in the English law from the beginning to this day, using language which perhaps those who have not studied the subject in one branch of it would not at first understand. It speaks of a debtor failing to meet his engagements who begins to keep house. You would suppose it was a very innocent performance, indeed, for a man to begin to keep house; but that means, in the English law, that the man shuts up his shop, just as the First National Bank did here, just as Jay Cooke did in Philadelphia, just as every man whose paper goes to protest and who cannot go on with his business is obliged to do; he shuts up his doors and stops payment. Then it provided, in addition, where the man did go on, as in some cases he was enabled to do in some way, selling out his goods but not paying his debts, that any creditor might summon him on a seven days' notice, instead of forty or fourteen, before the bankruptcy judge, or the chancellor, or the person, whoever it was, that was deputed to exercise bankruptcy jurisdiction. My friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] suggests that it was a notice to appear forthwith, and technically he is right, but the debtor had a leeway of seven days; and so, to make it short, I put it at seven days. He could be summoned by any creditor, not for mere commercial paper like this, which is more lenient still, but for any debt that the banker or the trader owes, the moment it was overdue, to appear forthwith before the person exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction, and required to pay that debt, with notice that if he did not he could be put into bankruptcy. If after seven days he did not appear, or appearing did not show that he had a good defense, or if it were a matter of dispute, appearing and putting in bail, giving sureties that he would pay in the end, then he was declared a bankrupt and his estate wound up. In fact, so far as that part of it goes, it is exactly what is proposed here. We propose, as you see, in the case of commercial paper, instead of a non-payment for seven days as it was in England, in effect—for although the creditor could summon him to pay forthwith, he could not proceed until the end of seven days—that forty days' non-payment shall be required. This law has been construed (and we all understand it alike on that point) that a debtor who owes a piece of paper which goes to protest, and proceedings in bankruptcy are taken against him upon it, may come before the judge who is to determine—and he has a right to a jury trial upon it if he likes—and submit this question, where he has an honest defense which he means to make to that paper. If it is a disputable piece of paper the judge does not undertake to try whether his defense is a good one or not; but if he has a defense, good or bad, that he honestly intends to make to it in good faith, then he is not a bankrupt and the proceeding is dismissed. In the mean time, in case it be an honest piece of paper, if he has paid it up before he is brought to trial before the judge or jury, then the proceeding falls. So my friend will see that, in every point of view, this statute of ours as it now stands, either with the fourteen or the forty days, is much more liberal and humane in protecting the rights of the honest debtor than any bankrupt law that has existed yet has provided.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to inquire of the Senator whether I am to understand him that the limitation as to time, seven days, is in the British statute?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I say.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Did I not understand the honorable Senator to say that there were some other indications of bankruptcy accompanying that act?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; the other matters are entirely independent. This stands independently by itself.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not wonder that my honorable friend finds it necessary to express himself against the severity and rigor of the principles of the English law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not expressed myself against them. I expressed myself, if my honorable friend will pardon me, against the severity and the rigor of the French, and of the Belgian, and the Holland law in not discharging the debtor after he had surrendered everything that he had for the benefit of his creditors, either on their application or his own—it must be solely on their application by these codes. I suggested that it was severe that he was not then allowed to begin the world anew again and try to aid society and himself by building up a fresh fortune by his industry and his perseverance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Assuming now all that the honorable Senator has stated in regard to the system in England, France, and Belgium to be exactly as stated, it illustrates the query with which I began, as to the adaptability of such a system as this to a country like ours. It may do in England; it may do in a country of shopkeepers, a country whose business is traffic solely, where commercial integrity may be enforced by law with greater strictness than we can hope to do here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a very extraordinary proposition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is not an extraordinary proposition, because all these matters grow out of the condition of things. You cannot make laws for England and America alike. The moral obligation of a contract is the same here as there; but the circumstances of the two nations are so very different that what would be expedient there for the enforcement of the obligation by law would not be at all proper here in the circumstances under which we are situated.

I have not been familiar with systems of bankruptcy in detail, but it is a matter of very great astonishment to me to find that this practice has been ingrafted upon any system in the world, that a man simply from neglect to pay a debt or an obligation within seven days should be held to be a bankrupt without any other incident connected with his history or with his transactions. Anybody can see that under certain circumstances that fact of itself might not be evidence either of a disposition to avoid his creditors or of an inability to meet their demands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will pardon an interruption, as he means to state me fairly, I am sure.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me remind my friend that, in answer to his question, I pointed out to him that under the existing law—and the same is true under the English law—that fact alone is only taken as prima facie evidence that a man is unable to pay his debts; and if it turns out that there is any other reason than the fact of inability why he does not meet his paper, when that appears to the court the proceeding does not go on under our law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Undoubtedly; but still the mischief is done. It is in law adjudged to be an act of bankruptcy, and it justifies proceedings; and the moment proceedings are begun there is an end of credit. The moment that suspicion arose over Jay Cooke & Co., they were bankrupt and their doom was sealed. Now you are providing a remedy for such a contingency as arose in the autumn of last year. Suppose this law had been in force at that time, and this precise provision had been in force, how many firms all over the country, solvent firms, would have been subject to be thrown into bankruptcy, over whose concerns, if they had been examined fairly, no suspicion of an inability to pay would ever suggest itself?

Mr. THURMAN. The present law was in force, a great deal more severe than our bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And they went under, and that I understand to have been one of the great complaints.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many went into bankruptcy?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As many as were forced, or as many as were attempted to be forced into bankruptcy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is true.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What I am arguing is that it does not necessarily follow, nor does it seem to me to follow in any just sense at all, that because a man delays to pay he therefore is of course a bankrupt and ought to be held to be a bankrupt, so that his creditors should have a right to force him into bankruptcy.

It may be, Mr. President, that my views are unsound. I am not certain that I have a very decided conviction about this point myself. I may say that I have not; but it strikes me as a very extraordinary proposition indeed that a man should be held to be a bankrupt simply because for a period of time he has neglected, or, if you please, been unable, to meet his liabilities, he himself holding a large estate, abundant enough to pay all his debts, and having been honest, doing no single act that would be called a delinquency otherwise—I think that is extraordinary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How would the Senator define a bankrupt?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Evading his creditors; taking to his house; conveying his property in view of bankruptcy; these are what I call acts of bankruptcy—acts of delinquency.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, anybody who would come under the statute of Elizabeth merely.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, I do not know much about Elizabeth or her statutes, [laughter,] especially upon this subject. But what I mean to say is, that this circumstance standing by itself does not necessarily imply any of those acts of delinquency which it seems to me justify proceedings against a man who might notwithstanding be solvent in all respects.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it is something of a mortification to me to feel it to be a duty to get up and reply to my friend from Maine, because I so often follow his opinions that I feel almost out of place when I rise to oppose anything that he has said. But I do beg the Senate to consider this point carefully, because this is a most important question about this business. People from the cities of the East, who are creditors, are constantly writing me that we have let this law down now so far in this very respect and others in favor of the debtor class that we have ruined all the rights of creditors. Now, what are the rights of creditor and debtor? The Senator from Maine does not dispute that when a man promises to pay another, for a proper consideration, a given sum of money, he ought to do it; the law obliges him to do it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I agree to that.

Mr. LOGAN. "The pound of flesh" must be exacted; is that it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say that when a man promises to give a pound of flesh, even, he ought to give it, unless it be the flesh of some slave who is not the master of himself. If I promise my friend from Illinois to give him a pound of my flesh, to be laid out in hard labor for me, I ought to keep my engagement. Of course there may be promises which are void, because they are against humanity and Christianity, and against the liberty of the citizen, and against the public peace. That is all true enough. We are not talking about pounds of flesh of that kind; but we are speaking about a commercial country, where one of the elements of its civilization and progress must be, if there is anything in civilization in this world, that men are to keep their engagements. What idea can you have of a nation, as a prosperous and honorable and intelligent and growing one, which is based upon a state of society whose honor is to be found in breaking rather than keeping engagements? It cannot be said. Every one of us, my friend from Illinois I know as well as I, would cry shame upon such a proposition.

What is the converse of it? It is that every man is bound to perform the commercial promises that he makes upon a sufficient consideration, and in the full possession of his senses. My friend must agree to that. There can be no doubt of it; and that is a rule of morals as well as a rule of law. It is a rule which is inbred in the very life-blood of every nation which can expect to attain to the progress that our ideas of morality and of the future lead us to believe in. Without it you can be nothing, and with it you may be everything.

Now, this law comes in and says, not that the man shall not perform his engagements, not that he shall perform them instantly, but in the idea of mercy it gives him a certain breathing space to recover himself if he can; but if it turns out that he cannot meet his engagements, what does morality require? It requires that his property, which has been built up out of the funds that he has received, for which he has made these promises, shall be returned to the men whom he owes, in equal proportion. That is the morality of it, unless you are to say that it is lawful for a man to buy property upon credit, and then equally lawful and honest for him to defy his creditors and keep the property and not pay his debts; and nobody can say that.

My friend from Maine says that it is an extraordinary proposition that the inability of a trader to pay his debts is an act of bankruptcy. Well, what is an act of bankruptcy? It is equivalent to saying that it is an extraordinary proposition that the inability of a man to pay his debts is an inability of the man to pay his debts, because that is what "bankruptcy" means. That may be a very extraordinary proposition in Maine—I do not undertake to say—but it is not an extraordinary proposition in the moral or the commercial world.

But let us look a little further, because this is too serious a matter to have mere joking upon. My friend says, strike that out because it is hard upon the debtor. You do to him what? You say to him "Your property must be equally divided among all your creditors, because your conduct has been such, upon examination, as to satisfy the court"—and it is only in that case that he becomes a bankrupt by the non-payment of his paper—"that you are unable to go on with your business; you have not paid; you cannot pay; you cannot raise the money to go on with your business and meet your engagements. What are you going to do? Are you going to keep your store full of goods, and sell them out, and put the money in your pocket and not pay; or what are you going to do? Are you going to lock up your store and do nothing with your goods until the rats and the ravages of time have destroyed all their value? Are you going"—to use a Maine illustration—"to leave your logs to rot in the boom until they become of no good to anybody, and put yourself on the ground, folding up your arms and saying, 'I am an honest man, and you must not touch my property, and must not ask me to pay; let it go to ruin?'" Is that the doctrine? It certainly is not; I know it is not the doctrine of my friend. He is only speaking somewhat like a poet, upon an imaginary topic.

Look a little further. Suppose you strike this out—and I have said this before—do you then say that the man is not a bankrupt because he does not pay? Suppose you take this out of the law, where is he then? He is a man still unable to meet his engagements, is he not? Striking this out of the law does not make him able to pay, does not furnish any money to anybody; the Treasury of the United States is not called upon to fill his pocket, but he is left out of the protection, as he is out of the proceedings, of the law, for what? Suppose he owes me and lives in Maine; I sue him in the circuit court of the United States, entirely independent of the local laws of Maine. They may have a law like Illinois for an equal division among creditors on suit. Suing in the United States court as a non-resident creditor, I am not troubled about that; it is a local law, that does not disturb me in the least, that has no application to my case. I therefore, by the marshal, seize the whole of this man's property for a debt which does not amount to a tenth of it, and eat it up with the expenses of watching and keeping, while I am getting a judgment against him, and leave his neighbors at home to go begging for the money that is due to them when I have got my pay and have eaten the thing up in fees and costs.

Why, Mr. President, I have on my desk, though I will not take the time to read it now, one instance in the city of New York showing the beauty of this process of State law as distinguished from the bankrupt law, where a man was proceeded against under the State law, having a piece of real estate—merely a vacant lot. Three judgments were got against him, the amount of all of which was just about equal to the value of the lot of land that was sold, the first judgment being about one-third or one fourth of that. There were three suits. The consequence was, under the State law to which my friend would turn over the honest debtor, that the sheriff, in making his three levies and charging his three commissions and charging for his three sets of watchmen, and so on, consumed so much, that the net proceeds of the sale just paid the first judgment of a creditor of the property, and the fees eat up all the rest, and the two other judgment creditors got nothing. That is to say, a piece of property which was worth, say $10,000—I have the official statement here from the sheriff's office, which illustrates State law—one single estate of $10,000 was entirely eaten up in paying the judgment of a creditor whose debt amounted to a fourth of it.

Now my friend proposes that this first creditor and the sheriff in the New York case shall take everything, because the man does not meet his engagements at the time, and that the other two creditors shall get nothing; whereas if that very case had been a case where the man was only temporarily embarrassed none of these creditors could have got any advantage by a suit, and they therefore would have had no motive to bring suit, and unless they wished to spend their money for nothing they would not have brought suit, and then the cause, if necessary, would have gone into bankruptcy; and then the Senator would have found, as exorbitant as fees have been in bankruptcy, (as they are in every court unless people defend their rights,) that each creditor would have got his proportion, and would have got at least 50 per cent. on each of the debts.

I submit to my friend, whose candor I entirely acknowledge and whose intelligence I so often lean upon and follow, that it is an act of cruelty to the debtor, to say nothing of the equality that ought to exist among creditors in sharing the estate it is an act of cruelty to take him out from this forty-day provision, and turn him over to the various conditions of the State laws in every part of the Union, and to the various rights of creditors in all parts of the Union, some suing under State laws and some suing under national laws.

Why is it, Mr. President, that the Constitution gives to Congress the right to regulate commerce among the several States? What is the philosophy of that? Is it not that, in respect to commercial affairs and business transactions such as are carried on by traders, and brokers, and merchants, and bankers, there shall be a national unity of industry and of progress and of enterprise, and at the same time there shall be a unity of redress, so that in these respects there shall fall under one broad and equitable law the interests of every part of the community—so that no provision of one State law shall secure to the citizens of that State a preference over others—so that no right of a non-resident shall enable him in a State to secure a preference which the citizens of that State may not be enabled to reach?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion? This law does not apply to national banks, I understand?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand it does.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then, if this principle applied to national banks, what would have been their condition last autumn when they suspended? Do I understand that this law would apply to them?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In my opinion the bankrupt laws of the United States apply to national banks and to State banks, although there is another remedy for winding them up under the bank act itself, which I do not assume is superseded by this later act of bankruptcy, and yet I have no doubt myself that the bankrupt law applies to national banks as falling under the head of bankers. And so, as my friend says, what would have been the result? The result would have been exactly what it was, because the law of the last fall in these respects is exactly as it is proposed now, except that we have extended the fourteen days to forty. And then what did we find? We found that every national bank that was honest, that was good, that had assets sufficient to meet its liabilities, went on; that it was not proceeded against in bankruptcy; that it was not proceeded against under the bank act of 1864. My friend will find it so in every case, speaking largely—I do not mean literally every case, but ninety-five in a hundred—that where the failing debtor or the debtor not being able to meet his engagements at the day, in this breathing-space of forty days, makes an exhibit to his creditors, none having the right to get an advantage over him or over their brother creditors, which, when made, appears to them to be honest and fair, so that there is hope for him, provision will be made by which he can go on without any bankruptcy at all. This very feature, that while the debtor is in suspense no man can commit a fraud against another, or get an advantage over another, either the debtor or his friends, or the creditors as against each other, is one of the most valuable features of the law; and yet, in common experience, you do not see it at all, because it is never brought into court. It is like many laws against crime and wrong in society, which are valuable, not because there are indictments and convictions under them as a rule, but they are valuable as holding out a terror to evil-doers and an inducement to right-doers to uphold and maintain the law. Society could not go on if the only value of penal and police law was in the fact that it had condemnations and punishments. It is only the fact that the law is held up as a standard by which right-minded men endeavor to conform their movements and their actions, and as the terror which is held out to wrong-minded men that they will be punished and defeated if they attempt to overreach it. That is the value of the law. It is the value of this one. There are a thousand cases under this very clause which we are discussing where the debtor is preserved from a bankruptcy and a ruin that would otherwise follow him to a certainty under the operations of seizures on execution and suits for debt, which by this law are entirely obviated, and he goes on without the aid of the law ever having been invoked at all. I beg Senators to reflect upon this, that you destroy not merely the few cases that actually come before the courts under it, but you take away the very sheet-anchor of the safety of the debtor, and of the creditor too as it respects fairness and equal dealing, and leave everybody at sea.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, there was one remark made by the Senator from Maine that I hope, on reflection, he will not repeat, nay, that he will take back, and that was, that it is impossible to maintain in the United States as high a standard of commercial integrity as is required in England.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not mean to say that.

Mr. THURMAN. That is what the Senator did say, and I am glad to hear that he did not mean to say it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I question whether anything that passed from me is susceptible of that interpretation. While, perhaps, I did not express myself accurately, what I did mean to say was, that it was unreasonable to expect, in a country situated as we are, with so great a variety of interests, that our people could meet their commercial obligations with that strictness and promptness, and submit to that exactitude of law in regard to such matters, which might be enforced in England. I believe I said distinctly that of course the same code of morals applied here as there; that the moral obligation was the same here as there; but that it would be impossible to force a community like ours by the same code of laws that would apply to a trading and commercial community. That was the distinction I intended to draw.

Mr. THURMAN. I felt very confident that my friend did not mean what his language seemed to import, and I am the last man to hold anybody to language inconsiderately used, or such as may fall from him in the heat of an unprepared speech. But I have this to say to my friend from Maine, that this provision to which he takes exception applies only to merchants, traders, bankers, brokers, manufacturers, and miners. Perhaps all those persons, or nearly all of them, were included under the old English word in the first bankrupt law—"trader"—and I think it will be found by looking at the decisions of the courts construing that word that it was held to include nearly or quite all the classes of persons mentioned in the bill now before the Senate. And now I put it to my friend, who is well versed in history, will he go back to the statute of bankruptcy in the reign of Henry VIII, which was very much more stringent than this law which is now before us, and tell me that the people of England, in the reign of Henry VIII, were any more able to keep their commercial engagements than the people of the United States in the year of grace 1874? Why, sir, England in the time of Henry VIII was almost a barbarous country, as the Senator well knows. England in the time of Henry VIII had not the one-hundredth part of the commerce of the United States of America at this time. There was nothing like the wealth there then that we have now, nothing like that great body of merchants and bankers and trading men that come within the provisions of the section that is now under consideration, and who are a thousand times more able to meet their engagements than were the traders of the time of Henry VIII in England. No, sir; it is not true that our people are less able to meet their commercial engagements than the people generally of the kingdom of Great Britain. If so, all our talk, and boasted talk, about the prosperity of this country is nothing but boast, and very empty boast at that. If it be true that the commercial people of the United States are worse able to keep their commercial engagements than the commercial people of Great Britain, all this talk of ours is mere boasting. It is true that in Great Britain there are greater fortunes than there are to be found in the United States; it is true that the aggregate wealth is greater than in the United States; but the average wealth of the commercial and business men of that country is not so much greater, if greater at all, than that of the people engaged in business in the United States that you can erect one standard for them and must erect a very much lower standard for us.

Now, Mr. President, I must beg leave to repeat, and I am very sorry to do it, the ground on which this provision in the act which is sought to be stricken out rests, and I will do it in as few words as possible, apologizing to those Senators who heard me before when I went into the matter somewhat at length; but there is this misfortune about this bill, and it is a misfortune that attends a great many of the laws that we enact and which are of the greatest importance, that if they have no political significance or party interest they attract very little attention from the Senate, and that consequently what is said about them is very little listened to, and half the time the Senate is not half full. I repeat, therefore, what I said before, that the fundamental idea of a bankrupt law is, not that the debtor has been guilty of fraud, but simply that he is unable to pay his debts as they mature in the usual course of business; and if he is a trader, that is, if he is here a merchant, a banker, a broker, a manufacturer, or a miner, or if the party is one of the great corporations that we mentioned, a moneyed, business, or manufacturing corporation, and is unable to pay its debts as they mature in the ordinary course of business, then he or it is insolvent, then his or its property is liable to be seized by any of the various processes known to the law; and then steps in the bankrupt law and says that as this man is unable to meet his engagements, as his property is liable to seizure, as unjust preferences thereby may be created, the Congress of the United States, under the plain power conferred upon it by the Constitution, enacts a law which will take that property and administer it equally for the benefit of all the creditors, share and share alike, proportioned to their respective claims.

Is there any injustice in that? Is there any hardship in that? Is not equality equity all the world over? And when it is simply a question (for that is what it comes to) where that estate shall be administered, whether it shall be subjected to all the preferences and advantages that may be obtained in the common-law courts, or whether it shall be administered as a decedent's estate is administered, for the benefit of all creditors alike, pray where is the hardship to either creditor or debtor in that? Sir, I must confess that I am a little surprised at the assaults made upon this section of our bill when in point of fact it ameliorates the present law so much that the only real question among business men in the country is whether we have not taken out the whole life-blood from it. Among the hundreds of letters that have come to the committee and members of the committee, not one of them says this is too harsh. The only thing that is said by either side is, "You have perhaps taken out the very life-blood from the law and made it of no efficacy whatever."

When we have made this law to require not only one-third of the creditors in number but one-fourth in amount to put a person in bankruptcy; when we have extended this provision from fourteen to forty days; when we have provided that a majority of creditors in number and amount may ask the court, and the court may at their petition dismiss the whole proceeding; when we have provided for a composition, with the assent of a majority of the creditors in number and amount and of the bankrupt debtor, which when approved by the court shall be executed; when we have provided all these things for the ease of the creditor as well as the protection of the debtor, it does seem to me passing strange that we should be held up here as if we had gone back to the barbarous ages of antiquity when the creditor could sell the debtor and his children into slavery for the payment of his debts. No, sir; there is no justice whatsoever in this criticism.

If we intend to take away the very foundation of a bankrupt law, and to say that nothing shall be bankruptcy but fraud, contrary to the provisions of bankrupt laws in every civilized country in the world, Congress can do it; but then it will be a serious question whether the law is worth the paper upon which it is printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COOPER. I am requested by the Senator from Georgia, Mr. NORWOOD, to inform the Senate that he is detained by sickness.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Ramsey, Ransom, Sherman, Spencer, Tipton, and West—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Crozier, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Stevenson, Stewart, Sumner, Thurman, and Wright—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Gordon, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire——

Mr. SHERMAN. I have an amendment pending.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Senate has determined not to strike out this clause, I move now to insert, amendatory of it, between lines 39 and 40, the words, "being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner." This is only to make the idea a little clearer, and hence I suppose the Senator from Vermont will not object to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection, if the Senator prefers to insert those words. The committee think that to be the law now; but there is no harm, of course, in making it perfectly specific.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I move to add, after the words that have just been inserted, the words "and being indebted over $3,000."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. It is, in substance, a branch and part of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois that has been rejected. It comes to the same thing. This experiment of limiting the sum to a large one which should be acted upon was tried under the act of 1800, and was one of the causes, so far as you can gather from the debates, that led to its repeal, it making one rule for one class of the community and another for another, growing out of the fact of their humbleness in society or the extensiveness of their speculations. The only limitation that ought to be made, and the only one that is made in the existing law, which we have followed in this respect, is one where the supposed bankruptcy being gone through with will not furnish from the debtor assets enough to pay the cost of the proceeding, and, therefore, you might just as well leave him to be eaten up by the creditors under the State laws as to force him to go through bankruptcy, or allow him to go through himself—the case being too trivial, in fact, for the law to take notice of; and that limitation now is $250.

This proposition of my friend from Ohio is to say that the inability to pay commercial paper by a merchant—I will not name the others, because it takes time; I take that as the chief of the class—the inability to pay commercial paper by a merchant, that is to say, the failure of a merchant, shall not bring him within the scope of the bankrupt law to have an equal distribution of his property among his creditors, instead of an unequal one under State laws by forty suits instead of one, unless he owes $3,000; that all the small traders of the country in my friend's State and in mine shall be left to the pitiless mercy—if I can use a contradictory expression to show how intense I mean it to be—to the pitiless severity, to put it in a straightforward phrase, of their creditors, without anything to break the shock, without a single day to intervene between them and ruin. It leaves that class of men without the protecting benefit of this provision of bankruptcy, under which a man cannot be forced to be a bankrupt without a third in value of his creditors asking for it, and which protects him in substance, as I have stated, but not in technical form, as my friend from Illinois supposed I said, against vexatious and preferential suits during this period of time, or any other period, in fact, as long as he is able to go on, and for forty days while he is not, and then holds him under the protection of a quarter of his creditors, including his friends, and a third of his debts in amount—I say it is unmerciful to the debtor, if my friend will reflect upon it, and it is unjust to the creditor, in the sense that it deprives him of that equal share in the estate of the debtor who cannot meet his engagements, who under the law would be entitled to force him for his own protection, when otherwise he would wait, be merciful, and would compose—forces him to fly to the lawyer and to the sheriff at once, in order to gain an advantage which, if he does not gain for himself, he feels sure some other creditor will before the time is out.

I can illustrate that to my friend. In my own town there is an institution, with which I have a very small connection, because wealth has not crowned me with her banners, which lends money—a national bank. I happen to know—and I only take that as illustration, and it is so all over the country—that there may be $100,000 of suspended paper in that bank from this panic, paper of small traders, owing from five hundred to fifteen hundred or twenty-five hundred dollars. The bank does not take any steps against those traders; it believes them to be honest; it believes that if they can be let alone they will work out. Under the laws of the State of Vermont, but for this bankrupt act, which holds out to every creditor the fact that he cannot get an advantage that he can hold on to, that bank would feel obliged, as a duty to its stockholders, to sue every one of these men, because, wiping out this law, any other creditor that they owe, any city merchant, or anybody else, would come forward and by the sheriff seize their property, and sell it at a sacrifice in fourteen days, unless they have a defense, and thus ruin the men and deprive all the other creditors of any chance.

I appeal to my friend, whose good sense in these matters I fully appreciate; I appeal to his judgment and conscience, whether these considerations that I have named to him in the interest of the debtor himself, though a small one, and in the interest of the creditors themselves, to uphold the debtor and keep him on his feet instead of letting him go to ruin, do not require us to leave this limit where the law leaves it now, where it is presumptively the limit of the expenses of the procedure. I put it to my friend for his consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont does not mistake, but it seems to me he does not correctly inform the Senate of, the nature of the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt law. This is an adversary proceeding. The Senator speaks of this section as being something for the benefit of the debtor, and therefore he says that this amendment of mine will be an injury to the debtor. Why, Mr. President, all the proceedings under this section of the act are adversary proceedings, commenced by the creditors against the debtor. By other provisions of the act the debtor has the right to appeal for the benefit of the bankrupt law, but under the thirty-ninth section he is the defendant; the proceedings are adversary as against him. Every proceeding is commenced by a certain number of the creditors against the debtor to force him unwillingly into bankruptcy.

I hope Senators, especially in considering this amendment, which I regard as important, will consider the nature of the proceedings we are called upon now to inaugurate. This is an adversary proceeding against the debtor. So far as it provides penalties for fraud or wrong, or enables the creditors to seize the property of the debtor when any act is done inconsistent with plain and simple honesty, I have not a word to say; whether the property is great or small, the debts great or little, it ought to be pursued. But the question is whether we ought to authorize proceedings in bankruptcy where the whole amount of indebtedness is but $3,000. Take the case of the State of Ohio. We have only two judicial districts in that State in which all these proceedings must be commenced. We have a population of three million of people, so that one million and a half of the people must be brought before a single court at a remote part of the State in order to have either the benefit or the penalties of this law. You take the case of an ordinary small trader in any town in Ohio outside of Cleveland and Cincinnati, and if his debts are $3,000, and his property is $3,000, if he is forced into bankruptcy under the thirty-ninth section of the act he will not pay one single cent on the dollar.

My friend says that the limit of $250 is about the limit of the costs of a proceeding in bankruptcy; but that has not been the general experience, when you take into consideration the expense of proving accounts, the necessity of going before the register in bankruptcy, and the necessity of having all the various proceedings carried on. I have not the tables to show the average cost of a proceeding in bankruptcy, but it is manifest that if all the small cases of insolvency in the States are to be carried into courts so sparse, only one to a population of a million and a half, the creditors can get nothing, or scarcely anything. But that is not all.

This proceeding in bankruptcy is a harsh proceeding. In a commercial community to be called a bankrupt is not so bad a thing. Merchants and traders, and business men of that kind, sometimes are overwhelmed by misfortunes, and the most honest, and the most conscientious, and the most useful men may sometimes be driven into bankruptcy; and it is no reproach to a man under those circumstances. A man engaged in the hazards of a large trade—buying abroad, transporting at a distance—becoming a bankrupt is not injured in reputation or character; but it is very different when you are dealing with a class of people, small traders, in remote communities. There the failure of a man to pay his debts, mostly to his neighbors around him, mostly domestic debts, is quite a different thing, and in popular opinion to be called a bankrupt in a community of that kind is quite a different term from the ordinary term of a commercial bankrupt when applied to large transactions and men engaged in hazardous business.

Now, in this respect we are passing a remedial law, a law for the collection of debts; because this compulsory proceeding in bankruptcy is only a law for the collection of debts. It is nothing else. It is not a law for the relief of creditors; it is not a law for the relief of debtors; it is a law for the collection of debts. It is a proceeding adversary to the debtor, to enforce and to use the enginery of the law to collect a debt. There is an allegation made that the man has committed some act recited in this law, or that he has neglected to pay his commercial paper, say for forty days; and it is quite a different proceeding, it seems to me, from an ordinary bankruptcy proceeding in a trading community. What is the occasion for it? Are not the laws of the State sufficiently powerful and sufficiently potent and sufficiently well guarded to enable the State courts to administer a little estate where the whole amount of indebtedness is $3,000? I say that when you carry all these small bankruptcies among the small class of traders into the courts of the United States, at a great expense, you first injure the creditors by wasting the assets, and you inflict an unnecessary penalty upon the debtor. Why, sir, in a great number of these cases where small traders and merchants fail in the country towns, they will struggle along and struggle along and struggle on, and finally get their heads above water and get out of debt. What is the use of forcing them by an adversary proceeding to go many miles off, one or two hundred miles away, to have their estates settled by persons who are accustomed to large transactions and large fees? A man who is called before a court of common pleas to confess a judgment, or whose estate may be settled up under the direction of a local tribunal under an assignment for the general benefit of creditors—which is an ordinary transaction in our country—may well be startled at your bankruptcy provisions. When a man becomes involved, almost the first thing he does is to assign his assets to some trustee in the neighborhood for the benefit of all his creditors; that, under the laws of Ohio, is a very common proceeding; and then the local courts administer this fund, distribute it; and it does not cost one-tenth as much as it would under the courts of the United States. No one can know better than my colleague, who for a long time sat upon the bench, that these local courts, which are brought home to the communities, brought home to the people, will take and settle up the business of a debtor, will enforce the collection of debts, and preserve the rights of creditors, with one-tenth the cost that the district court of the United States can or will do it. It is not possible in the nature of things that it should be otherwise. The local tribunals will dispose of all these cases promptly and cheaply.

It is different, however, in regard to merchants whose transactions extend to other States, whose creditors may be in other States. There it is proper enough to give the benefit of the courts of the United States; but in the cases provided for by my amendment the debts would generally be local in the neighborhood, and it would be unreasonable to require the small creditors of a small debtor to prove their claims, and go two hundred miles in order to make their proof, with a view to getting, at some time in the dim future, 1 or 5 or 10 per cent. of a broken, insolvent, bankrupt estate, where the whole amount of indebtedness is $3,000.

I tell the Senator from Vermont that in my judgment this simple provision will make the people of the country, of the Western States at least, more contented and better satisfied with this law. They will then regard this compulsory provision of the law as simply a means of enforcing and collecting the debts of merchants whose transactions extend beyond the limits of the State, and not a mere trader, manufacturer, or miner. Take a small manufacturing establishment, take a cigar manufacturer, or take an ordinary trader, whose whole sales would not amount to $3,000 a year, and whose whole indebtedness is under $3,000. It is de minimis—too small a matter to take before a court of the United States. You ought to deny the jurisdiction of that court to cases which are so small.

It seems to me, therefore, that in the interest of creditor and debtor it would be wiser to extend the limitation now contained in the bankrupt law of $250 up to that amount which by common practice is shown to be not more than enough to exhaust all the estate. When a man is in debt only $3,000, certainly we can leave him to the local courts to administer the property. As for particular persons getting priority of lien, there is no trouble about that. If there is any difficulty in that way, the debtor knows it, and he may step forward and apply for proceedings in bankruptcy. He may make an assignment for the general benefit of his creditors, and I presume there is no State in the Union where a general assignment for the benefit of all the creditors does not operate equally and alike to all, and does not cut off any but prior mortgages and liens that have already accrued. That is an ordinary proceeding, I presume, in every State.

It seems to me, then, that this provision inserted in the law would tend to satisfy thousands and tens of thousands of people all over the country, who will feel that this bankrupt law, by transferring their small business and their small affairs to an expensive tribunal at a remote distance, is not doing them justice and right. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be adopted, and if it is, or whether it is or not, I shall submit a proposition to extend the period of forty days to ninety days.

Mr. STEWART. I think the reasons assigned by the Senator from Ohio, with all due respect, operate very strongly against his amendment. He says that small debtors would be oppressed by this proceeding, because the estate would be exhausted in costs and used up in that way. Suppose that to be true; yet creditors are not near as likely, as practice has shown, to bring these suits. Our courts before the passage of the bankrupt law were full of attachment suits. There was a motive on the part of the greedy creditor then to get all the property, if there was little; and he would go into a State court and grab it, and break up and destroy the debtor entirely. There was that inducement on his part on the one hand; on the other hand there was an inducement for the small debtor to go and buy a stock of goods, and, when he got them to the place of destination, to have them attached the next day on an old debt, in pursuance of a previous arrangement. That was very common. It usually happened in amounts under $3,000, and it occurred almost daily in some States of the Union. A man would get a bill of goods, and when he had got two or three thousand dollars' worth of goods, his cousin, or somebody who had an old claim against him, which it was understood in the beginning should go into his hands, would attach them; or some greedy creditor would attach this small stock. The consequence was to multiply litigation, as any lawyer who has practiced law and observed the operation of the attachment laws of the different States will remember; and it is in these cases of small amounts that the greedy creditor was oppressive, and that the rascally debtor had a chance to have attachments put upon the property by collusion. These transactions figure in cases where the amounts were under $3,000 generally.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator misapprehends the amendment. The amendment is confined to cases where there is no allegation of fraud. It does not reach all cases.

Mr. STEWART. It does not make any difference about fraud. I am not mistaken. Suppose there is no allegation of fraud; here is a small debtor who owes $3,000. The creditor gets an idea that he may not be able to pay, and pounces upon his property when the debtor is struggling on, and drags him up under the attachment laws of almost any State of the Union; whereas under the bankrupt law, if he commences proceedings at all, he knows there must be a distribution among all the creditors, and consequently the inducement to commence suit and make a grab-game is taken away. On the other hand, if the debtor's cousin, or his uncle, or other relative, has an old note and attaches the property, he has got to come in and divide with recent creditors, including the person who furnished the goods.

My experience is that this has worked most wholesomely, and this amendment would destroy the whole value of the bankrupt bill, which requires honesty among small dealers in the first place, and next requires forbearance, for it is to the interest of creditors to be forbearing toward small dealers; whereas under the State attachment laws the inducement to grab for all on the part of one is so great that you have frequent attachment, and then the inducement on the part of the debtor to get a stock of goods and have them attached to pay an old debt, and so you have questions of fraud to be canvassed.

This amendment would destroy the efficacy and the moral effect of the bankrupt law, in my opinion. I would not give a cent for it if it did not take away the motive of the creditor to destroy small debtors. That it does, because it does not permit him to go in and destroy a small debtor. It is a protection to small debtors, and it is a protection to honest creditors. They can trust now, when they could not formerly. They can trust a man now, when they could not under the State attachment laws. They have a great deal better chance on both sides. It is the most wholesome provision of the law, in my opinion.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall occupy but a very few minutes in making some suggestions in reference to this amendment. I fully appreciate the motives of my colleague in offering it, and I have felt from the time that he showed it to me that it deserved consideration; but the more I have reflected upon it, the more I have become satisfied that it would not be wise to adopt it.

In the first place, I wish to mention one fact connected with this amendment that would make it extremely embarrassing. It is true that it is limited to the cases of bankers, brokers, merchants, traders, manufacturers, or miners, and requires that in those cases, before either of them shall be put into bankruptcy, their debts shall be over $3,000. The fact, then, is a jurisdictional fact. There must be $3,000 indebtedness, or the court will not have jurisdiction. Whether there are $3,000 of indebtedness or not, is a fact that cannot be ascertained until long after the proceedings have been pending. You cannot require that fact to be verified in the first instance to authorize the filing of a petition. All that the petitioner could do would be to swear that according to the best of his belief the debtor owed $3,000. He might not know the fact; the debtor might owe it, or he might not. All that the petitioner could reasonably be required to swear would be that he believed his debtor owed $3,000; but whether he did owe $3,000 or not is a fact that could not be definitely ascertained until long after the petition had been filed and the proceedings had gone on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my colleague whether it would be just as easy to know the whole amount of his indebtedness as it would to know the fraction necessary under the section as reported by the committee?

Mr. THURMAN. I was going to come to that, because I anticipated that that question would be asked. The difference between the two cases is this: where a certain proportion of the indebtedness is required to concur in preferring the petition, as we require, if it is found, upon investigation, that that proportion does not exist, we give the parties day, we give them, to use a legal term, imparlance, that they may make up the amount; but in the case of the amendment offered by my colleague there is no such way of mending the matter. If it should turn out at any time—perhaps after long litigation upon the very subject of the bankrupt's debts, after great expenses had been incurred, perhaps nearly all the expenses incurred—that his debts were only exactly $3,000 at the time the petition was filed, then the whole proceeding falls for want of jurisdiction.

It was therefore that I suggested to my colleague yesterday that it would be a much wiser way to get at this matter, to require that the petitioning creditors should represent debts, say of $1,000. Then if they represented $1,000, as they must be one-third, his object would be attained, and the jurisdictional fact would not exist which would be required if the amendment were in his form.

That is the first thing. Then in respect to the difficulty of proving debts where the debts are so small, or the onerous onus that is thrown on people going, as my colleague says, two hundred miles to prove debts. There is no such thing as that. The law now allows the debts to be proved before any register in bankruptcy or any commissioner of the circuit court of the United States, and there are very few counties in any State that do not contain either a register in bankruptcy or a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States, where there is such a court in existence. In fact the late Chief Justice appointed registers, I believe, in every congressional district in the whole United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One or more.

Mr. THURMAN. He appointed one, and might appoint more; and we know that in every congressional district in the United States there are one or more, and frequently a great many, commissioners of the circuit court of the United States. I think it would be a wise thing, and I think if no one else does I shall propose an amendment to that clause of the bankrupt law, so as to allow an account to be proved before any justice of the peace or notary public. There is no reason in the world why it should not be. It has to be acted upon in the end by the bankrupt court, and the probation of it may just as will be made before a justice of the peace or a notary public as it may before a register in bankruptcy or a United States commissioner, and thus every man may prove it at his own door.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the substance of this amendment, it must be admitted that in principle there is no difference between an indebtedness of $3,000 and under and a larger indebtedness; that is to say, the same reasons that obtain for a bankrupt law where the indebtedness exceeds $3,000 exist where the indebtedness is less than $3,000. But further than that, as there is no difference in principle, so there is very little practical importance, I am inclined to think, in the amendment suggested by my colleague; for I do not believe that in one case out of a hundred—perhaps I should be safe in saying one case in five hundred—any banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner has been put into compulsory bankruptcy who did not owe more than $3,000. But, now, what a curious kind of man he would be—banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner—who should suspend payment and be put into bankruptcy when his indebtedness was not more than $3,000. Practically I think the amendment is not of any very great consequence.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will strike out the words "trader and manufacturer" I should be willing to compromise with him, but the word "trader" is very extensive.

Mr. THURMAN. It is a very extensive word; and "manufacturer" is extensive, for there are a great many small manufacturers in some little matters; but yet I think it will be found that there are very few cases indeed where the indebtedness has not exceeded the sum of $3,000.

Mr. President, I do not know that it is necessary to say more on this subject. In principle there is no difference between the smaller debts and the larger debts, and practically I think it is not of much importance, but I should not leave this without one further observation. The object of a bankrupt law is twofold: first, it is remedial, affording a remedy by which the estate of an insolvent person may be equitably administered—that is its remedial feature; but it has another feature, and that is, the feature of prevention. The very fact of the existence of such a law prevents undue and fraudulent preferences, and the necessity for their prevention is just as great, not in amount but in degree, where the debts are $3,000 or under, as where they are more than that; and therefore I do not know why this preventive feature of the bankrupt law, which makes it impossible, or at least deters the giving of fraudulent preferences or the obtaining of advantages, should not apply as well where the debt is under $3,000 as where it is over that amount. However, I must say for myself that I would be perfectly willing that the provision of the law which requires that the debt shall amount to $250 should be increased to $1,000. I would have no objection to that so far as I am concerned. I speak, however, for myself alone. That would require really an indebtedness of $3,000. I think, however, it would be better not to increase it so much as that; say not more than $500, which would require a total indebtness of at least $1,500, and that can be achieved in a moment by an amendment striking out "$250" in the proper section of the bankrupt law, and inserting "$500"

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has introduced this amendment in relief of and for the benefit of small traders whose indebtedness is not more than $3,000. In my opinion he is doing that class of traders and merchants a great injury. It is very true, as the Senator says, that this involuntary bankruptcy is adversary, hostile, when it is put into operation towards a trader; but it is also very true that the existence of such a law is a great protection to him. For instance, during the last hundred days, here is a trader who owes $2,000. If the bankrupt law did not protect him, his property would be seized by attachment and execution, and he ruined; but the banks and persons who are willing to give credit to that small trader know that no person can step in ahead of them, and the consequence is that they are willing to give him credit. He can go to a bank and he can borrow $500; the bank is perfectly sure that no execution creditor can come in and take away his property. In that way the law is a great protection to the traders. Therefore I think the amendment is injurious to the very class that the Senator proposes and hopes to benefit.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

ROUND VALLEY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill to amend an act "to restore the Round Valley Indian reservation in California to the public lands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM M. CHENAULT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 26, 1874, in relation to the claim of the heirs of the late William M. Chenault, of Carthage, Missouri, for property alleged to have been taken by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMASTERS' ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 7, 1874, in relation to what accounts of regular and additional paymasters of the Army for disbursements during the late war are unsettled, what amounts and from whom they are due, and what has been done toward their collection; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Accounts a resolution which is a substitute for one referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The substitute alone will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department and the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department have leave jointly to employ a clerk during the present session of Congress, or such part thereof as may be necessary, at the usual rate of compensation.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

HON. GEORGE P. MARSH'S PAPER ON IRRIGATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 27, 1864, in relation to a copy of a paper on irrigation, contributed to the Commissioner of Agriculture at his request, in the year last past, by Hon. George P. Marsh, minister of the United States in Italy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs that this communication be read, as it contains what will doubtless be information to a good many gentlemen of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution adopted on the 27th instant by the House of Representatives in the following words, namely:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to this House a copy of the paper on irrigation contributed to the Commissioner of Agriculture, at his request, in the year last past, by George P. Marsh, minister of the United States in Italy."

The paper referred to in the resolution was never received by this Department, and I therefore addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Agriculture, desiring such information as he might possess in relation to said paper. A copy of his reply, of this date, is inclosed, from which it appears that said paper is in the possession of the Department of Agriculture.

Inasmuch as I am unable to comply with the resolution, I have the honor to return the same to the House of Representatives.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO,
Secretary.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 28, 1874.

SIR: My attention was called this morning to the resolution of Mr. KASSON referred to in your communication, and I wrote a note to him to say that I had such an article from Mr. Marsh, which had been prepared at my instance for the annual report of this Department, and that it would be doing injustice to Mr. Marsh to send it to Congress. It would necessarily exclude it from the report of this Department.

Respectfully,

FREDERICK WATTS,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Hon. C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will please observe that the Bureau or Department of Agriculture is not connected with any one of the Cabinet Departments.

Mr. KASSON. In connection with this subject I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be directed to communicate to this House a copy of the paper on irrigation contributed to said Commissioner, at his request, in the year last past, by George P. Marsh, minister of the United States in Italy.

I suppose it is quite right for the Commissioner of Agriculture to decline to report any information to the House through the Secretary of the Interior, he having no connection with that Department. At the same time this information, furnished to him at his request by a gentleman of such distinguished competency as Mr. Marsh, contains facts which are important in connection with the subject of irrigation. I think it should be published now for the information of the House, and afterward it can accompany the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I notice that the resolution undertakes to direct the Commissioner of Agriculture to do something. I desire to inquire if there is any authority by law which gives to one branch of Congress the right to direct the Commissioner of Agriculture to do anything?

Mr. KASSON. The same right that we have to direct the head of any of the Departments.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand that in the law creating the Department of the Treasury, and possibly one or two other of the Departments, there is a provision that the head of that Department shall obey the direction of either House of Congress. That provision does not exist in relation to some of the Departments, and I inquire if it is contained in the law creating the Department of Agriculture?

The SPEAKER. What the Chair desired to call to the attention of the House was the fact that the Department of Agriculture was treated as an independent Department, just as the Department of War, or the Navy Department. The Commissioner of Agriculture makes his report through none of the other Departments. By some legislation, which the Chair thinks has not been entirely understood, the Commissioner of Agriculture is as independent as the head of any one of the several Executive Departments.

Mr. KASSON. I think it is quite safe to use the word "direct" on the part of the House of Representatives, and I have no idea but the Commissioner will cheerfully comply with it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me that the House should not undertake to assert an authority which it does not possess by law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the Commissioner raise the point, and he will find out whether we have the power.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I think it is not a dignified attitude for this House to undertake to assert authority before we find out whether we have the right. The question I asked was, whether anybody believed we had that authority. My colleague [Mr. BUTLER] does not say.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do most thoroughly believe it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does this resolution require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I object.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. G. F. HOAR said: I find by reference to the law creating the Department of Agriculture that authority is expressly reserved to either House of Congress to direct the Commissioner to furnish information. I therefore withdraw my objection to the resolution.

No further objection being made, the resolution was adopted.

SAGINAW RIVER, MICHIGAN.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, instructed to transmit to this House copies of the report of survey and estimates of cost for the improvement of the Saginaw River, in the State of Michigan, now on file in the said War Department, that the same may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this resolution direct the Secretary of War to furnish this information to be referred to the Committee on Commerce?

The SPEAKER. It directs the Secretary of War to furnish this information "that the same may be referred to the Committee on Commerce."

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution ought to go to the Committee on Commerce under the practice of the House.

Mr. CONGER. It is a mere resolution calling for information to be reported to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRADLEY. I ask permission to make a statement. There has been a survey made and the reports are now on file. I simply want to get these papers from the War Department before the Committee on Commerce. The resolution calls for that information that it may be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I think there should be no objection to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object; although, if it is the practice of the House that such resolutions should be referred, I think it ought to be adhered to.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARKANSAS CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. THOMAS. I call up the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Asa Hodges is entitled prima facie to a seat in the Forty-third Congress as a Representative from the first congressional district of the State of Arkansas, without prejudice to the right of L. C. Ganse, claiming to have been elected thereto, to contest his right to the same upon the merits.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, when I reported yesterday the resolution which has just been read, I stated that I did so under the unanimous instruction of the Committee on Elections, or, at least, that the resolution had been adopted by the committee with no one dissenting. I do not desire to make any speech or to use many words. I want simply to say that the committee did not think proper to accompany the resolution in this case with a report; but I did not understand them to desire that a full and fair statement of the case might not be made, if the House should think it necessary. On yesterday, when I demanded the previous question, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] intimated that the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] a member of the committee, desired the case to go over in order that he might be heard. To put myself right and not appear to have been guilty of any discourtesy to the gentleman from Mississippi—and surely I could have intended none—I will now say that I would gladly have the gentleman correct me if I misrepresented him in the statement that no one member of the Committee on Elections dissented from the resolution; and if he desires to have time, and the House desires to hear further statements of the matter, I am willing to proceed and to divide with him the time to which I am entitled. But I do not desire to raise the discussion. On the other hand, personally, I have no desire to have the matter come before the House without a full statement, nor does the committee. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] if he desires to be heard.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to oppose this resolution or to be heard on it. And I would not have said a word but for the misapprehension of my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] yesterday, growing out of the fact that there is another case from Arkansas pending.

When this case was before the committee I gave my views at some length, as I thought it should, from its peculiar features, be investigated and determined alone upon its merits. The committee were of the opinion that the resolution of the House devolved upon them the duty of reporting first upon the prima facie right. I reserved for myself the right to dissent from this action of the committee, but stated that I did not expect to do so.

While I am upon the floor I will say, Mr. Speaker, that having examined this case upon the evidence, to which the committee deemed themselves restricted by the resolution referring it to them, I could come to but one conclusion, and that was that the prima facie case, the right to be seated, pending the contest, upon the evidence before us, is with the gentleman in whose behalf that report is made. I cannot, therefore, dissent from the report, but shall vote for it.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I do not desire to make any further statement, or to enter upon any discussion of the case. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections was agreed to.

Mr. HODGES appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the law of July 11, 1868.

SOUTHERN TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at half-past twelve, and reports are in order from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to report back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1557) to incorporate the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company, and to grant the right of way through the public lands to the same.

The Clerk having proceeded to read the bill,

Mr. HOUGHTON. I suggest that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with for a reason which I will explain.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on the bill being read.

Mr. HOUGHTON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Indiana will listen to me for one moment I will explain why I ask that the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Before any discussion arises on the bill, I make the point of order that it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It will be for the gentleman to make the point of order after the bill has been fully read. The gentleman from California will state what he desires.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I desired to state, Mr. Speaker, that there are provisions contained in this bill upon which the committee are divided. These questions will arise also under the bill reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals, which is now before the House, and which is made the special order for the 25th day of this month. It is the wish of both committees, as expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, that that bill should be first considered. There is no objection on the part of our committee to that course being adopted; and I therefore propose that this bill shall be the special order for the 26th of this month, the day following the day set for the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that this bill grants the right of way through the public lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was looking through the bill to see whether it was obnoxious to the point of order. The bill does grant the railroad the right of way and a certain amount of public lands on each side thereof; which of course would bring it under the rule that the bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole if the point of order be made.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I suggest that this is not the disposition of public property. It is not the right to use the property in any sense, at least not in the sense which requires such matters to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the reading of the tenth section of the bill, in order that the House may know on what he rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That for the purpose of encouraging and aiding the early construction of the Southern Transcontinental Railroad, and thereby promoting the public convenience, the settlement of the vast agricultural, pastoral, and mineral regions penetrated by said road, and developing their immense resources, and for the purpose of securing the more speedy, safe, and convenient transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores over the route of said road, and facilitating the supply of the military posts now established, or hereafter to be established, along said route, the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to said Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line as set forth in the first section of this act. Said right of way is granted to said company to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the center line of said railroad, where it may pass through the public lands, together with all necessary grounds for station-buildings, water-stations, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, workshops, engine-houses, machine-shops, and depots, not exceeding ten acres for each station, at intervals of not less than five miles; and said right of way and grounds shall be exempt from taxation within the Territories of the United States. And there is hereby given to said company the right, power, and authority to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, earth, stone, timber, and other building material necessary for the construction of the same. The provisions of this act concerning the donation of the right of way to said company for its railroad through the public lands shall apply to all classes of lands at the disposal of the United States Government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California will observe, in addition to a grant of one hundred feet on each side, it gives ten acres to every five miles, and also gives the right to take timber, &c., from the public lands. That is clearly a donation of property within the meaning of the rule recently adopted by the House, and therefore the Chair holds the first discussion of the bill must be had in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to which it goes.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I desire to have sundry amendments referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with that bill, to be offered when it comes up for consideration; and I ask unanimous consent that they be ordered to be printed. I offer them on behalf of myself and others of the minority of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

It was ordered accordingly.

DEWIGHT DESILVA.

On motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1415) for the relief of Dewight Desilva, of Deposit, New York; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I am instructed by the Committee on War Claims to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1565) relating to the commissioners of claims, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that it do pass. I ask for its consideration by the House at this time.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. SPEER. I rise to a point of order on the bill, that it contains an appropriation, and must have the first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. KASSON. I make the same point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Iowa make the point of order that this bill contains an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Clerk will read again the third section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That in lieu of the three agents now provided by law the said commissioners shall be authorized to employ five agents to investigate and report upon claims; and the said agents shall have power to administer oaths and take depositions. And in addition to the clerks now authorized by law, the said commissioners may employ each one clerk, at a salary not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The bill in my opinion makes no appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It clearly goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the Chair holds the point of order to be well taken. The bill is accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

JOHN T. WATSON.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1271) for the relief of John T. Watson, with the recommendation that it do pass, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the report ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PLEASURE-YACHT FEARLESS.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (S. No. 216) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Fearless, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, grants authority to the owner of the pleasure-yacht Fearless, of the port of Detroit, in the State of Michigan, to change the name of said yacht to that of Lily, by which name said vessel shall be known and registered.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman from Michigan, who reports back this bill, state what public reason there is for this change of name?

Mr. CONGER. It has been the custom of Congress to change the name of pleasure-yachts, which cannot be used for transporting passengers and merchandise, and which are built mainly to test the different models of ship-building. It has uniformly been allowed in the House, although we have refused to change the names of commercial vessels.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman say that this cannot prejudice the Government in any way?

Mr. CONGER. It cannot. It has been passed by the Senate, and the two Committees of Commerce of the House and the Senate have uniformly, for sufficient reason, recommended the change of names of this class of pleasure-yachts.

Mr. SPEER. Is this a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. CONGER. It is.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether the committee have sufficient information that this yacht is used only for pleasure purposes?

Mr. CONGER. It is used only for this purpose. It is a small steam pleasure-yacht, purchased in New York and taken to the Detroit River by a gentleman there, for his own purposes. It cannot be used for commercial purposes.

Mr. POTTER. This vessel cannot be used for commercial purposes?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; it cannot, as the papers state.

Mr. POTTER. I am unfavorable to changing the names of vessels where they are used for commercial purposes.

Mr. CONGER. This is a pleasure-yacht, and the gentleman himself secured the passage of a bill changing the name of such a vessel.

Mr. COX. Why is it asked that the name of this vessel shall be changed?

Mr. CONGER. I send to the Clerk's desk the petition of Mr. Brush, and I ask the gentleman from New York to hear it read.

The Clerk read the petition.

Mr. COX. I do not object to granting this privilege in a special case, but I think there ought to be a general law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels.

Mr. CONGER. In answer to that I would say that there should be no general law to change the names of vessels. A steamboat may, under a popular name, draw a large number of passengers. Such a case has occurred, and one hundred and seventy-three lives were lost.

Mr. COX. Why should we not leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. CONGER. I think the discretion of Congress is better than that of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COX. We do not, all of us, think so.

Mr. POTTER. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, and two of these applications for special legislation have come before that committee. It seems to me that this matter of changing the names of vessels should be left to the discretion of some tribunal, say to the district court of the United States. I do not object to changing the name of this vessel, inasmuch as it is not engaged in trade.

Mr. CONGER. This case belongs to the class to which the gentleman does not object.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMER CARRIE.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 485) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the steamer Carrie, of Eastport, Maine.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the Clerk read the petition in this case.

The Clerk read the petition.

Mr. CONGER. The law now authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to grant registers to foreign vessels wrecked upon our coast, upon which the repairs in our own harbors cost in American material and labor three-fourths of the value of the vessel. The vessel wrecked must be within three miles of our coast. In this case the vessel was wrecked outside of that distance; it is not known exactly where the disaster occurred, but she was brought into an American port in a disabled condition and was sold for salvage—I think for fifty dollars; but I think the purchaser repaired her and sold her for $1,050, enough to bring the vessel within the rule that authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to grant a register, if she had been wrecked upon our coast. This bill is merely to authorize the Secretary to do what he would have done under the same circumstances if the vessel had been wrecked upon our coast.

Mr. POTTER. The bill authorizes the owner to change the name of the vessel.

Mr. CONGER. Not at all.

Mr. POTTER. Undoubtedly; it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register under any name that may be selected.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is there any objection to that? I know about this case personally. It cannot be shown to the Secretary of the Treasury that this vessel was wrecked in our waters, and therefore he sends the papers to Congress. The precedents are all in favor of just such an act as this. It is, of course, our policy not to duplicate the names of vessels. If the owner of the vessel is allowed to select the name he will not select a name which comes in conflict with the name of any other vessel in our waters. I can see no objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECURITY OF LIFE ON STEAMBOATS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. NEGLEY. The bill is very voluminous. I ask that it be considered now, and until disposed of in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RUSK. I object to that.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is a long bill, and its reading will take up all of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Does the bill contain any provision that makes it amenable to a point of order requiring its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. NEGLEY. It is not my wish to antagonize the Committee on Appropriations, or any other committee, with this bill. But it is a very important measure, and should receive the careful consideration of the House. The motion I made was for the purpose of avoiding delay or the loss of the bill by the expiration of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now in the morning hour, and must remain there until some disposition is made of it. Will the gentleman inform the Chair—because he is familiar with the provisions of the bill, and the Chair cannot determine the question without reading over the bill—whether it contains anything making it amenable to a point of order?

Mr. NEGLEY. It does not. There is no appropriation in it of any kind.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Are there important amendments in the bill which are not contained in the bill as originally printed?

Mr. NEGLEY. There are but two amendments not in the originally printed bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill in full.

Mr. POTTER. After the bill has been read will objection be in order to its consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. COX. And points of order will be considered as reserved?

The SPEAKER. They are always reserved until the bill is read in the hearing of the House.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, and after some time,

The SPEAKER said: Without taking up further time of the House in the reading of the bill, the Chair will suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. NEGLEY] that it comes within the scope of the rule adopted by the House, as will be seen by reference to page 75, section 62, of the bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and considered therein under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The bill must necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole. The gentleman asks that, when reached, it shall be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. DAWES. It is a special order.

The SPEAKER. Not as a special order, but when reached on the General Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. All the sections of the old law are reprinted in this bill without modification. Section 62 is but the provision of the old law, creating no new officers.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read section 62, after which the Chair will state his ruling. And the Chair begs the attention of the House to the reading, because the House is just now coming back to the old practice of doing business in Committee of the Whole. It is very important that we should proceed understandingly.

The Clerk read of section 62 the following:

SEC. 62. That in addition to the local boards of inspectors now appointed by law, there shall be local boards designated and appointed for the district of Puget Sound, Washington Territory; for the district of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; for the district of Albany, New York; for the district of Apalachicola, Florida; for the district of Evansville, Indiana; and for the district of Huron, Michigan; and also at Marquette, in the district of Superior. And each local inspector of the several districts, respectively, shall be paid annually, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, the following compensation, to wit.

The SPEAKER. Then follows the enumeration of the several districts, which need not be read.

Mr. CONGER. In continuation of what I have said, allow me to say that this section is the law as it now stands.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. The Clerk will now read section 66.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 66. That the salaries of all supervising inspectors, local inspectors, assistant inspectors, supervising inspector-general, and clerks herein provided for, together with their traveling and other expenses when on official duty, and all instruments, books, blanks, stationery, furniture, and other things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, shall be paid for, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of the revenue received into the Treasury from the inspection of steam-vessels and the licensing of the officers of such vessels, as provided for by the terms of this act; and the same is hereby appropriated for the payment of such expenses, or so much thereof as may be required for such purposes.

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that this section merely re-enacts the salaries already in force, is not well taken, for the reason that if this bill should be considered in the House, and in order, of course an amendment doubling or trebling the salaries would be in order, and therefore the bill would become amenable to the point of order.

In this connection the Chair desires to recur to a ruling made in the House this morning. The Chair ruled that a bill reported from the Committee on War Claims should go to the Committee of the Whole, because in the third section it provides for additional clerks to be paid, and gives them a specific salary. In the first section of the bill it is provided that the time within which petitions for the allowance of claims should be presented to the Committee on Claims should be extended to the 3d of March. Now, the section extending the commission will doubtless involve an additional appropriation. But that of itself would not carry it to the Committee of the Whole, because it does not necessarily require an appropriation. But the provision which gives additional clerks with specific salaries would require an appropriation, and that would carry it to the Committee of the Whole.

But the mere contingent fact that the extension of the time within which claims may be filed may involve an appropriation at some distant day, (although the House morally knows that such an appropriation will be made,) does not, in the opinion of the Chair, justify a ruling which would send the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Recurring, however, to the bill under consideration, the mere fact that provisions for salaries now in force under the law are repealed in this bill does not save it from the point of order, because if the Chair should rule that a bill containing such provisions might be first considered in the House, it would be within the power of any member to move an amendment to those provisions so as to increase salaries. Hence the bill must necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I see the distinction which the Chair makes; but I wish to say that certain sections of the bill, including the two which have been read, are not altered from the existing law, but are reprinted in this bill that the whole law on this subject may stand together.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. But the gentleman sees, of course, that that fact could not affect the ruling. The bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The bill being so referred, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] who has charge of the bill, asks that when it is reached in Committee of the Whole it may be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. POTTER. On the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. No, sir; it is on the General Calendar without any special order. It must be reached in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that when it shall be reached it may be considered under the five-minute rule. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

HOMESTEADS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1760) to secure homesteads to actual settlers; which was read a first and second time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill. When several sections had been read,

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, said: Mr. Speaker, this bill has been read far enough to show that it is liable to the point of order, and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. One of the early sections provides for granting homesteads, which I understand is disposing of the property of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. So far as that matter goes, I answer the gentleman from Vermont that it is merely a re-enactment of the old law, giving no privilege which is not given by existing law. This bill proposes to amend the existing law in other respects.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the point of the gentleman from Vermont to be that the bill enlarges the scope of the provisions under which lands are donated.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Not only that; but I suppose that a re-enactment of a law authorizing public lands to be given away for any purpose subjects a bill to the rule, in the same way as would a reappropriation of money.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order lies against the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is it in order to move that the bill be made a special order for this day three weeks, after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent except on Monday, when a motion to suspend the rules is in order. The bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the General Calendar. On Monday the gentleman can either ask the House to make the bill a special order in committee, or to take it by a suspension of the rules out of committee for consideration in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that an amendment which I desire to offer to this bill when it shall be considered may be printed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

SWAMP LANDS IN HOLT COUNTY, MISSOURI.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1761) granting certain swamp lands in Holt County, Missouri, to the said Holt County for school purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. There is no need of reading that bill in full. The title is sufficient to show that it is liable to the point of order.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will not press that point. I think if the House will hear an explanation as to the nature of the bill, and the necessity for early action upon it, members will be satisfied that there is no necessity for referring it to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] will be allowed to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs that the bill be read in full. That is the right of a committee reporting a bill before the point is ruled upon.

The bill was read. It provides that all the tract of land embraced in what is known as Tarkio Lake, in congressional township numbered 60, of range 39, in the county of Holt, State of Missouri, and which was left unsurveyed at the time the Government of the United States had made a survey of the other lands in said township and county, and which was described on the plat of the survey of said lands as a meandering lake, be granted to said county of Holt for school purposes. The second section directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have said lands surveyed, and to cause to be executed to the county of Holt a patent for the same; but nothing in the act contained is to be so construed as to affect the rights of any person who may have in good faith gone upon said lands prior to January 1, 1874, with the intent of pre-empting or homesteading the same; and the county of Holt is required to make a title to any such person to an amount of land not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres upon the payment to the county of $1.25 per acre, provided that all cost of surveying said lands shall be paid by the county of Holt.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] the point of order being considered as pending, desires to make a brief explanation. If there be no objection the Chair will hear him.

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered by the House that a good many years ago all the swamp lands in the State of Missouri that were designated as such by the surveyors of the Government of the United States were by an act of Congress conveyed to the State of Missouri for school purposes. Subsequent to the passage of that act, the State passed a law donating these lands for a like purpose to the respective counties in which they were situated. At the time of the survey of those swamp lands the piece of land referred to in this bill was left unsurveyed. It was designated as a meandering lake. The fact is that it is a slough or pond situated in the county of Holt, and at this time surrounded by settlements. The people of Holt County desire to get this piece of land in order to drain it—not so much on account of the value of the land but because it generates diseases of all kinds. It is a cess-pool of disease, causing sickness to spread among the inhabitants who live in the vicinity. During the last summer there were twelve deaths from cholera in that neighborhood, supposed by the physicians who investigated the subject to have been caused by stagnant water and decaying vegetation upon this piece of land. The bill received the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Public Lands of this House at the last Congress, but for want of time was not passed; and I do ask the House in behalf of the health of this people to pass it at this time, so it may be ditched and drained before the warm weather sets in. It is supposed to contain twenty-five hundred acres of land. It is not worth a dime to the Government of the United States. It is not worth a dime to anybody until it is drained. It is said by the people there they can drain it by digging a ditch a mile and a half in length. They are willing to incur that expense in order to protect the health of the people in that neighborhood. I hope the House will give early action to this bill and pass it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri two questions: first, what is the extent of this land; and, secondly, how it occurred this tract of land was not surveyed and did not pass to the State of Missouri under the swamp-land act?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. It is supposed to contain about twenty-five hundred acres of land, as near as they can get at it. It was not surveyed, because I suppose the Government surveyors were too delicate to go into this stagnant water. It ought to have been surveyed. It did not pass as swamp land to the State of Missouri, because it was not designated as swamp land upon the plat of the surveyors, but as a meandering lake. If it had been designated as swamp land, it would have passed to this county, under the laws of the United States and the State of Missouri, long since. Because it was designated as I have already said, it did not pass under the swamp-land act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to having the bill considered now?

Mr. CONGER. I object to it, for the purpose——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman need not give any reason for it if he objects.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my objection if I cannot make a remark.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who is entitled to the floor on his motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill, insists on it.

Mr. WHEELER. I am willing to yield a moment if there is to be no further debate on this subject.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I raised the point of order on this bill, but as the discussion which has taken place has covered all the ground which would be covered by the discussion in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I now withdraw it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of the Army, and for allowances to officers of the Army for transportation of themselves and their baggage when traveling on duty without troops, escorts, or supplies, and for compensation of witnesses while on court-martial service; for traveling expenses of paymasters' clerks; for payment of postage on letters and packages and cost of telegrams received and sent by officers of the Army on public business, $11,450,000.

Mr. BECK. I move the following amendment, to come in at the end of that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That only actual traveling expenses shall be allowed to any person whatever in the service of the United States, and all allowances for mileage or transportation in excess of the amount actually paid are hereby declared illegal, and no credit shall be allowed to any of the disbursing officers of the United States for payment or allowance in violation of this provision.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, the reason I desire that to be added—and I hope the committee will agree to it—is that, under the arrangement of traveling expenses and mileage, large sums of money are paid, more than is necessary for the service of the agent of the Government. There can be no sort of injustice done to allow only the actual expenses of men traveling under orders of the Government.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope the Committee of the Whole will be brought to order, so we can hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is now in order, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BECK. I will remark to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who has charge of this bill, it is the same amendment of which I gave notice the other day. The sole object is to get clear of this thing of mileage, which in very many instances far exceeds the actual expenses of the agent of the Government while traveling on Government business. It occurred to me it was only right and proper to limit allowances of actual traveling expenses, and to provide that the disbursing officers of the United States should not settle in any other way than by paying actual traveling expenses, to be properly certified by the agent of the Government.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask the Clerk to report again the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WHEELER. I see no objection at all to that amendment.

Mr. DONNAN. I desire to say a word in relation to it. The Adjutant-General of the Army stated, in his testimony before the committee, that this was at once the most convenient, and, in his opinion, the most advisable way of settling those allowances. The testimony of the Quartermaster-General before the committee, given only yesterday, is to the effect that this does not more than cover the actual expenses of officers traveling on duty. Many officers, you will all bear me witness, have to travel beyond the lines of railway—perhaps during the major portion of the time they are traveling on duty beyond the lines of railway where only stage-routes may be had; and in those cases the actual expenses will amount more nearly to twenty-five cents a mile than ten cents a mile. Therefore both officers advised strongly against this proposed amendment, and for that reason I shall vote against it.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] allow me to suggest an amendment to his amendment—that in no case shall the allowance hereby made exceed that now provided by law?

Mr. DONNAN. That would be very unjust to officers who travel at an expense above twenty-five cents a mile.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] but it occurred to me——

Mr. WHEELER. Allow me to say that, as I understand the amendment of the gentleman, the officers under it will get the actual expenses of travel; and I do not want, under the operation of that, to exceed the allowance at present provided by law.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to make a suggestion on this subject. If this proviso should be adopted in the terms in which it is before the committee, the effect will be, or rather, I should say, the tendency will be, to make officers careless and prodigal of their expenses. The present system of limiting the amount tends to make them careful in their expenses, and prudent, because, if they can bring their expenses within that limit, there is a little margin to their advantage. I will, therefore, suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, although I had not proposed to take any particular part in the discussion of this bill, that he should fix a maximum, not too high, but that he fix a maximum and let it stand there as the cheapest and most economical way of paying for the expenses of our officers. If what is now paid is exorbitant, bring the rate down; but fix it not too high, and if they can get inside of that margin, well and good.

Mr. BECK. If I may be allowed another word, I would say that I am afraid the committee do not fairly comprehend the scope of the amendment. My intention by this amendment is to apply it to all persons, no matter whether in the Army, the Navy, or anywhere else, so as to pay them actual expenses and make all their other allowances equal. If an officer has to pay twenty-five cents a mile under extraordinary circumstances, why should he not have it; and if he could travel for three cents a mile, why should he be allowed ten? If any other agent of the Government is necessarily compelled to travel in the same way, though it will cost him more, why should he not be entitled to what he has actually paid? Of course his account must be rendered and all the items noted. The fact that one man has paid more is no reason why fifty men should have three times as much as they have actually paid. The object is to give them exactly the amount they expend, no more, no less. I cannot see that there is any wrong about it.

Mr. DONNAN. I would suggest to the gentleman that it hardly comes with a good grace from this House to make that change after we have re-established the mileage for members of Congress.

Mr. BECK. We pay members of Congress their actual traveling expenses, no more, no less. Don't we?

Mr. DONNAN. No, sir; I beg to inform the gentleman that we reversed that.

Mr. BECK. Well, we did wrong when we did.

Mr. DONNAN. How was the gentleman's vote upon that question?

Mr. BECK. I do not know how I voted. The RECORD will show. [Laughter.] It was a wrong thing to do, no matter how I voted. I think I voted against it; perhaps not; but the RECORD will show. That does not make it right. But I ask the gentleman why it is that a man traveling under orders of the Government in any capacity—I do not care whether he is in the Army or the Navy, or the Treasury or in any other Department of the Government—should receive as traveling expenses more than he actually pays out?

I heard this case exposed on the floor of the House, that a gentleman in conection with the Treasury Department—the statement will be found in the Globe, and has never been denied—had business pertaining to the superintendence of public buildings, one located in Baltimore, one in Philadelphia, one in New York, and one in Boston, as I recollect it; that he took but one trip, yet he charged mileage from Washington to Baltimore and back, from Washington to Philadelphia and back, from Washington to New York and back, and from Washington to Boston and back; collected the mileage, and had a free pass in his pocket all the time.

Mr. DONNAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky inform us who that gentleman was?

Mr. BECK. I refer the gentleman to the Globe for the statement which was made.

Mr. DONNAN. It is my impression that he would be liable to be tried by court-martial for rendering such an account.

Mr. BECK. It is done every day, and I wanted it to be put in the power, and make it the duty, of the accounting officers to stop such accounts.

Mr. DONNAN. Was he an officer in the military service?

Mr. BECK. He was not. I said that he was connected with the Treasury Department.

Mr. DONNAN. One word more, and then I will leave this question. My objection to this amendment is not made without knowledge; but I understand from officers who have served for thirty or forty years in the military service that this is the best and fairest way of establishing pay for the traveling done by an officer on duty. I believe the statements of these gentlemen to be correct, and therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to strike out the last word simply to say that I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to be that officers traveling on this allowance shall not make speculation of it, and that that is all he intends. It provides merely that if it costs an officer ten cents a mile to travel, he shall receive that amount and no more.

Mr. BECK. That is what I propose.

Mr. WHEELER. That is a right proposition, for I find that during the last year we paid $275,000 for the traveling expenses of officers, and I am perfectly willing that officers charged with duties which require them to travel shall have what it costs them to travel, but no more. If it costs them less than ten cents a mile they ought not to charge more.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he would be opposed to allowing more when it costs the officer more than ten cents a mile?

Mr. WHEELER. I will not go above ten cents a mile.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I rise to oppose the amendment. I wish to say that if we adopt this amendment, it may in many instances work great injustice to officers in the Army traveling under orders from one military department to another. For instance, an officer of the Engineer Corps, living in Washington and paying a moderate price for board, is ordered to New York City, and while there his expenses are very much larger than they are at home, and yet under this law he can only charge his actual traveling expenses of going from Washington to the point to which he is ordered, and he could not charge the difference in the cost of living. If he be a married man he cannot possibly do it, if he can only receive in any case ten cents a mile.

There is another aspect of this case that ought to be taken into consideration. I was in the Senate the other day, and one of the most distinguished members of the Senate was making a plea in favor of allowing mileage to members of Congress, and he said, among other things, that it was undoubtedly the intention of the framers of the Constitution to enable members of Congress to bring their wives and families with them to Washington. Sir, officers of the Army have families also, and, while I do not ask the Government to pay the expense of the removal of their families when they are ordered to distant sections, I do think the ten cents a mile allowed them now is as low as it ought to be, and is as small a sum as they ought to receive. Sir, it does not enable them to pay the expense of traveling, when they have even one member of the family, from Maine to Texas, under orders from the Department. I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky until they can properly consider it and have it examined by a committee qualified to examine the subject.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] accept my amendment, which is in these words?

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to allow more than ten cents a mile.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; I accept that amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I did not hear the amendment read, and I desire to know whether it covers all the public service of the United States as well as the military service? I call attention to the fact that this amendment applies to the entire public service. I do not know, not being familiar with the business of the other branches of the service, whether such a rule would work equitably in every case.

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ARCHER. I renew it. I would say that within the last year the Committee on Accounts, in paying the mileage of witnesses, have adopted the rule to pay five cents a mile instead of ten, and we have heard no complaint from any one that the amount is too small to pay their expenses. I would say further that the Coast Survey have adopted a rule by which they pay their employés only the actual cost of travel, and pay them only on their sworn statement. I am acquainted with many of the employés in that service, and I have never heard any complaint from any of them against that rule. I do not speak of the naval officers in the employ of the Coast Survey, but of the other employés of that branch of the service. The only objection I see to the proviso of the gentleman fron Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is that it does not include the mileage of members of Congress.

Mr. BECK. It has been decided from the foundation of the Government to this time that a Senator or a Member of Congress is not an officer of the United States, and therefore my amendment cannot apply to them.

Mr. ARCHER. I am only sorry the amendment does not reach them. It is not quite as full as I would like to see it. I think the principle of mileage should be abolished, and, in lieu, actual traveling expenses allowed to members of Congress. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I wish to call the attention of this committee to the language of this amendment:

Provided, That only actual traveling expenses shall be allowed to any person in the service of the United States.

A member of Congress, if not an officer, is in the service of the United States.

Mr. BECK. No, sir; he is not.

Mr. GUNCKEL. There is a provision of law that officers traveling should be allowed ten cents per mile. There is another provision of law that a member of Congress shall be allowed twenty cents per mile. In the investigation by the Committee on Military Affairs, I started out with the same idea that my friend has, and commenced examining with a view to show that officers received more than their traveling expenses under this arrangement. After we passed a provision giving ourselves twenty cents per mile, I thought it would be very ungracious in me to pursue the investigation further, and I gave it up. If this proposed amendment does not include members of Congress, I will move an amendment that will include them, so that we may all be on a level. It has been said here that in very many cases, traveling by coach and otherwise, officers were put to a greater expense than ten cents per mile. That is true. But there is another provision, that an officer traveling may take the ten cents per mile if his expenses be under that, and if they be greater he may take transportation in kind. And if an officer is traveling by coach, it is the custom for him to take what the expenses actually are. The rule works advantageously for him, but not for the Government.

Mr. DONNAN. Transportation in kind does not cover his expenses.

Mr. ARCHER. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "United States" the words "including Senators, and Members and Delegates in the House of Representatives." No man in public employment should desire, under this subterfuge of mileage, to receive increased compensation. We all know that members of Congress receive a larger sum when they receive mileage than their actual traveling expenses. It seems proper that the expenses should be clearly indicated. I therefore trust that my proposition will be adopted. I do not myself desire, and I do not believe that any member of the House desires, to increase his salary by a mere subterfuge. We are all aware that by the mileage as re-established by the Senate amendment to the bill repealing the salary law of last March our compensation is actually increased. The only meritorious thing in the salary act of last March was the reduction of mileage to traveling expenses.

Mr. WHEELER. Without assuming to speak for the Committee on Appropriations, I wish to say that the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has my personal and hearty assent.

Mr. BECK. I desire to oppose the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I raise the point of order upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that it is not in order, either as not being germane to the bill or as containing new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman raise the point of order that it is contrary to existing law?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment had been submitted and discussed before the question was raised.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not think that should make a difference. I tried last year to avoid a point of order in that way, but the Chair decided against me.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to call attention——

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one point of order now pending, and it must be disposed of before another can be entertained.

Mr. WHEELER. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact, which in the confusion he has overlooked, that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana had been debated before the point of order was raised.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Allow me to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment now proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was presented by him, and I followed him, as soon as he took his seat, in raising the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in closing his remarks submitted the amendment he has indicated. No one spoke upon the amendment until the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] raised the point of order upon it, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, if I can do so in the Committee of the Whole, for it is certainly not in accordance with my understanding of the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment had not even been read from the Clerk's desk, and was therefore not in possession of the committee. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] said he would submit an amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] said that for his part he would not oppose it. The other gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] raised the point of order that it contained new legislation and was contrary to existing law. Upon that ground the Chair decided that the point of order was well taken.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment now be read? Since it has been discussed let us hear it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order. The amendment has already been ruled out of order, and is not before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The amendment has been ruled out.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I offered the amendment. It was handed to the Clerk. The gentleman from Indiana debated it; and that made discussion on the amendment as offered by me.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was not sent to the Clerk's desk till the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] which the Clerk will report.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I rise to a point of order. For the purpose of having a decision reached by the committee, I desire to make the same point of order in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky—that it is not in accordance with existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky has been debated. The point is not well taken.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to understand the whole scope of that decision. Is it the decision of the Chair that, no matter whether an amendment offered to any bill is in accordance with law or not, if it is considered and debated, no point of order can lie against it?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky has been read twice at the Clerk's desk and has been debated. No point having been taken upon it in time, the amendment is in order.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I only make a parliamentary inquiry in regard to the scope of that decision. As I understand, its effect is that it is not material whether an amendment offered is in accordance with existing law or not; that if it is read at the Clerk's desk and any word of debate takes place upon it, that fact makes it in order, whether it be in accordance with existing law or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will make a decision on that point when it shall come up. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky; which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That only actual traveling expenses shall be allowed to any person whatever in the service of the United States; and all allowances for mileage or transportation in excess of the amount actually paid are hereby declared illegal; and no credit shall be allowed to any of the disbursing officers of the United States for payment or allowances in violation of this provision: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to allow more than ten cents a mile for such transportation.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I make the further point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] has now been read at the Clerk's desk for the first time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken in his point. This amendment has been twice read.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Has the amendment of the gentleman from New York been read before?

The CHAIRMAN. It was offered as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and was accepted by him.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It therefore becomes a part of that amendment. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 70, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DONNAN and Mr. BECK were appointed.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Are we to understand that this amendment applies to all persons in the public service?

Mr. GARFIELD. In the military service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole is dividing upon the question. No debate is in order.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I reserve the right to call the yeas and nays on this amendment in the House.

Several MEMBERS. You cannot do that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before we pass from the pending section of the bill I desire to submit an amendment which, I think, will commend itself to the favorable consideration of the House. It is designed to come in as an independent proposition. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which in whole or in part was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land, on the condition that such railroad should be a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge for such transportation; nor shall any allowance be made out of any money appropriated by this act for the transportation of officers of the Army over any such road when on duty and under orders as a military officer of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the fourth section of the act of June 10, 1852, which is incorporated in the thirty-nine railroad land grants, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said lands hereby granted to the said State shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof for the purposes aforesaid and no others; and the said railroads shall be and remain public highways for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, on the 13th of last December I submitted to the House a resolution of inquiry calling upon the Secretary of War for information as to the amount of money paid since the war to railroad companies to whom these grants have been made upon the condition that they should transport without charge troops and property of the United States. The House has received an answer, stating that the information called for could not be furnished by the War Department, but must be obtained from the Treasury Department. The information, therefore, as to the amount of money thus paid is not before the House. But still I have some data from the War Department bearing on this subject. In the official regulations of the Quartermaster's Department I find there are thirty-nine roads constructed by the aid of the Government, and in the main, if not entirely, constructed by the Government. I find as to some of them the quartermasters are directed not to make payment, and as to others there is to be made a reduction of only 33⅓ per cent. from full rates, which latter arrangement applies to such roads as the Illinois Central and the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroads, and to many other leading land-grant roads of the West. I am not able to understand the ground upon which the War Department acts in reference to these payments or the justification for them. No person ever misapprehended the purpose of Congress in making these grants of land to these roads, that they should be forever highways for the transportation free of charge of the property and the troops of the United States, and as to the mails that they should be transported upon such terms as Congress should prescribe.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does his amendment go beyond the provisions contained in the law binding these companies?

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not. It just goes to the extent of the provision of the law binding these companies and the condition of the grants. And I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that this subject has been up before in this House, when one of the ablest of our committees, the Judiciary Committee of the Thirty-seventh Congress, reported fully to the House on the subject. They reported as to the proper construction of this language, because this section applies to the thirty-nine land-grant roads as the gentleman from New York will remember. That report received the unanimous approbation of the House. It declared the meaning of these terms was that the grants of land were made on condition these companies should transport the troops and property of the United States free of charge. I have never heard the soundness of that report called in question.

I wish to say, further, that during the embarrassments of the war the Illinois Central Railroad, which is owned almost entirely by foreign capitalists, received nearly $5,000,000 for transportation. No company, not even the Pacific Railroads, ever received so munificent an appropriation from the Government as did this Illinois Central Railroad. Yet, as I have already stated, that Illinois Central Railroad received during the war nearly $5,000,000 for the transportation of troops and supplies, although in fact built by the Government with the expressed right of free transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RICE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question in reference to the Illinois Central Railroad.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will be glad to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. RICE. I wish to ask him if, during the war, all Government freights had been carried free over the Illinois Central Railroad, whether it would have received any money whatever to pay its expenses?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it would. The stock rose independently of these heavy appropriations from our Treasury. Its stock was bought up by English capitalists at from thirty-five to thirty-nine cents on the dollar, and rose above par.

Mr. RICE. As I understand, oftentimes on that Illinois Central road, during the war, every one of the cars was taken possession of by the Government for Government use.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am only calling attention to the fact that they have received these vast sums of money from the Treasury. As I understand, they are now receiving two-thirds of the usual cost of transportation.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understand the gentleman's amendment applies only to the provisions of the law under which land grants were made to these companies, and in that regard I agree with the gentleman from Indiana.

DISTRICT INVESTIGATION.

The committee rose informally.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received communications from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] asking to be relieved from serving on the special committee to investigate into the affairs of this District, and as those gentlemen are serving already on two different committees of the House it is their right to decline. The Chair names in their stead Mr. WHEELER, of New York, and Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session, (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair.)

Mr. HURLBUT. I should like to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say a word, if my friend will allow me, and it is this: This provision only applies to those roads to which grants were made on the condition specified in the law making the grant of land, that they should transport troops and supplies of the Government free of charge.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move, pro forma, to strike out the last word.

I wish to correct an impression that might be derived from the statement of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] with regard to the Illinois Central Railroad. It is true that that road rendered very valuable services to the United States during the war. It is true, also, that it received large sums of money for the services rendered; but it is also true that all that service was rendered under a specific contract, settled by the Attorney-General, the President, and the Secretary of War, by which, in consideration that the railroad gave to the Government of the United States a prerogative which otherwise it would not have, that is, the first right to the use of the railroad, to the exclusion of all other business, the Government of the United States agreed to pay them not the entire value of the transportation, but what was agreed by those high officers to be a fair price for the use of the rolling stock and brain power of the road; and upon that basis the accounts of the Illinois Central were settled.

The gentleman from Indiana is in error in supposing that that road ever at any time undertook to avoid its legal responsibilities to the Government or made any pretense that was not thoroughly justified by law, that was not thoroughly carried out by both Houses of Congress in the conference report of 1868.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will excuse me. My statement was that the Government paid nearly five million dollars to the railroad. Does the gentleman controvert that? I said nothing about the other matter. This House again and again ingrafted upon appropriation bills a requirement to the Attorney-General that the money should be refunded.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not remember what was the amount. The amendment was put in by my distinguished friend, Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, and was defeated in the Senate. The ruling of the Senate was sustained by a conference committee. The ruling that was made, so far as the House was concerned, was that all that the United States had a right to claim from that road was the use of the road; and the Government settled with the road on that basis, paying them, I think it was, three-fourths of their usual charges.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana accomplished what he has claimed that it does, it would be eminently just. But it seems to me that he has drawn it, either by design or accidentally, so as to go very much beyond what he suggested was his object. Here are thirty land-grant roads; and the gentleman proposes to impose upon them the duty of conveying in their cars, and at their expense, troops and supplies of the United States gratuitously; when the only provision in the organic acts of those railroads, on which he rests, is that the roads, when constructed, shall be public highways, open to the use of the United States without compensation. In other words, the organic act of the railroad gives the United States the right to go on a road with rolling stock which it provides or pays for, and with servants which it employs and pays. But the gentleman undertakes to compel the roads to go a great deal further than the conditions of the organic act, and to require them to transport their agents and supplies, the roads furnishing the rolling stock, and also the servants whom they employ and pay.

Now, it seems to me that the gentleman from Indiana ought to limit his amendment, so as to provide that no money shall be paid to any railroad for performing any service which the United States is entitled to require without compensation by the provision of its organic act. I think some phrase of that kind ought to be inserted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman undertake to say that this means that the Government shall simply have the use of the track?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. There are few members of this House prepared to go as far as I am in asserting the power of this Government to compel these railroad companies which we have endowed to perform the conditions of their act of endowment. But I think it is one of the most unjust things, whenever there arises between a railroad company and the United States a fair judicial question about the reading of previous contracts or about the rights of either party under them, to undertake to settle that by laying the powerful hand of legislation on the road and depriving it of all its rights unless our construction of the law is yielded.

I say very frankly, as regards the question of the gentleman from Indiana, that I am not prepared to answer it; that is, when the United States makes grants to a railroad, endows it in part, and declares that the railroad shall be forever open to the use of the United States as a public highway, whether that implies that the railroad, in giving the Government the use of that public highway, shall furnish carriages and servants, I am not prepared to say. What I am prepared to say is, that it is grossly unjust to declare that, unless that question be judicially determined, we shall force upon the railroad our construction of that question and our decision of it without its being heard anywhere in a judicial proceeding. That is precisely what I object to in dealing with the Pacific Railroad.

Here the committee informally arose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been compelled to omit sending the resolution of investigation in regard to the affairs of the District to the Senate because of some gentlemen having declined, and others who were sought to serve being unwilling to do so. The gentleman from New York just appointed [Mr. WHEELER] declines to serve, on the ground that he is already on two committees. The rules of the House give him the right under those circumstances to decline. But the Chair must insist that when he cannot otherwise complete a committee ordered by the House, it becomes the duty of a gentleman to serve. The Chair now names the gentleman from New York, Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments already pending.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the amendment to the amendment; and I wish to call the attention of the House to this subject, for I know of none more interesting or that ought more fully to attract the attention of the House. This amendment applies more to the Illinois Central Railroad Company than to any other; it is one of the greatest railroads in the country. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] is mistaken as to any contract ratified by Congress. Congress has over and over again instructed the Secretary of War not to pay money to this company for the transportation of troops and munitions of war, and has required the Attorney-General to sue this company for money which it owes the Government; but there has never been any action by the House, in any shape or form, ratifying any right of this company to charge for the transportation of troops, munitions of war, &c. Here is a corporation which was created by the munificence of Congress, who gave them an unexampled grant of public lands. Sir, men have made large fortunes out of that grant. What was the meaning of the act by which the grant was made? Was it not that the company should transport, free of charge, the soldiers and the munitions of war of the Government? This matter should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The evident intention of Congress was that they should transport troops and munitions of war free of charge over that road, and no gentleman upon this floor ever denied it. That is the fair interpretation of the law.

I know, sir, the power of corporations and how much they influence the action of this body; but if Congress consents to let this corporation escape from its just responsibilities under the grant which organized it, then the people have little to expect at the hands of this Congress.

Sir, I undertake to say that it cost the Government $100,000 to transport the troops from Illinois to Dakota to protect the surveying parties of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POTTER obtained the floor.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment? I do not propose to address the House upon it.

Mr. POTTER. I have no objection, if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend the amendment, by striking out all after the eleventh line and inserting—

No part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Mr. POTTER. I want first to say that I agree entirely with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] that Congress ought not to lay the strong arm of its power on any persons who have a great judicial question pending between them and the Government of the United States and predetermine it in favor of the Government. I did not, however, understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] had any such scope as that. As I understood his amendment, as read from the Clerk's desk, it simply provides that those corporations which had agreed to carry the troops and munitions of war of the Government without charge should receive no compensation for that service. I am far from asserting that when the act granting lands to any such company declared the railway should be a public highway the company receiving the land grant was thereby required to convey without charge whatever passengers or freights the Government might wish carried, and I do not understand the gentleman from Indiana to claim any such result.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion to him? The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana requires as a condition to the organic act that the railroad to the Pacific shall be a public highway.

Mr. POTTER. I trust the gentleman from Indiana will agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts in making the proposed amendment clear of the difficulty the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests. I agree with him that grants conditioned that the companies should hold their roads as public highways may not necessarily require them to carry for nothing anything that the Government may ask them to carry. The effect of such a condition is a serious question. It is one that ought not to be prejudged here. It is a question to be settled in the courts. But if the act granting aid to any company does clearly require the company to perform such service without pay, then it seems proper to say in this act of appropriation that no payment shall be made for services thus required to be rendered without further compensation than the original grant.

I want in this connection to say a single word further. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] objects to our predetermining against even a railway company any grave question affecting its rights that may be raised here. When he made that suggestion he referred to a subject which relates to the essential nature of this Government. According to my notion, and the notions of those holding like views about government, Congress has no power by legislation to destroy vested rights nor to impair the obligation of contracts. I know very well that the effect of the legal-tender decisions was to subvert that doctrine, and to declare that the power of Congress in that case, and perhaps generally, to impair the obligation of contracts, exists in all cases when not especially inhibited in the Constitution. If that was the effect of that decision, then the first thing, in my judgment, that the people of the United States should do should be to insist on so amending the Constitution as to take away from Congress any such power. The people of no State in the Union confers that power upon their Legislature. There is, I believe, no State in the Union that does not limit its Legislature in the exercise of their powers, by providing in effect that they may not destroy nor impair vested rights.

The restrictions thus imposed by the people of the respective States upon their own Legislatures are in addition to the general restriction contained in the Constitution of the United States, that no State should pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. That no such limitation upon the powers of Congress was inserted in the Federal Constitution was because, as it seems to me every candid student of that subject must admit, the framers of that Constitution never supposed that the Congress, without express grant, and by mere force of its choice of means to exercise the delegated powers, would assume a power so destructive of the rights of persons, and so at variance with the general nature of our governments, as well State as Federal.

Nevertheless the Congress, when it made Treasury notes a legal tender, did assume this extraordinary power, and the judicial department of the Government has sustained it. Whether as a general power or as an exceptional one, existing only during the exigencies of war, may not be clear from the decision. Let us hope the latter only. But since this power has been recognized as existing in Congress, I insist the Constitution shall be so amended as to put the question at rest. If it is a power not to be permitted to the State Legislatures, still less is it a power that should be permitted to the Federal Legislature. A popular government—the government of the majority—is, within proper limits, the best government for our race. But when without such limits; when the will of the majority may determine not only the making and administration of the laws, but may disregard vested rights and the sacred obligation of contracts, such a government, instead of being the best, is likely to become the worst possible.

The gentleman from Massachusetts insists that we ought not summarily to strike down the vested rights of even a railway company. I agree to that; but beyond that I insist, as a general rule, that Congress ought to possess no power to disregard or impair the obligation of contracts at all, whether made between citizens and the Government or between different citizens; and that, if this is not now clear, the Constitution should be so amended as to make it clear at once and forever.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be again read; and I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] to listen to its reading.

Mr. POTTER. I understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is quite willing that his amendment should be perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and then the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, as follows:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which, in whole or in part, was constructed by the aid of a grant of public lands on the condition that such railroad should be a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge for such transportation; nor shall any allowance be made out of any money appropriated by this act for the transportation of officers of the Army over any such road when on duty and under orders as military officers of the United States.

The amendment of Mr. G. F. HOAR was to strike out all after the word "such," before the word "railroad," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "transportation should be made free of charge;" so that the amendment shall read:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which, in whole or in part, was constructed by the aid of a grant of public lands on the condition that such transportation should be free of charge.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say only this——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] accept the amendment to his amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment and on the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and upon a division there were—ayes 55, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. G. F. HOAR were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 82, noes 66.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to strike out the amendment as amended. While I am not prepared, of course, to express an opinion as to whether this original law, which has been quoted here, forbids the payment by the Government of any money for the transportation of Government troops or supplies over these roads, neither am I prepared to acquiesce in what I understand has been hitherto the ruling of the Department—that it does not forbid that payment.

As I understand this amendment as amended on motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] it leaves the question precisely where it was before, for it provides that nothing shall be paid for transporting Government troops and supplies where by existing law that transportation is to be made free of charge. That is the whole question involved; and, as I understand, it has been decided hitherto by the Department adversely to the right of the Government to have such transportation free of charge.

If I had been able to obtain the floor prior to the vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] I would have suggested as an amendment to the original proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that which, it seems to me, will provide the only way in which we can reach this case; that is, by providing that the question may be judicially determined. And in the first instance, in order to provide that, we should withhold the money, and then make provision of law, as was made by the last Congress in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad, that any railroad from which this money has been withheld might bring its suit in the Court of Claims, and have the question determined there the same as though this proposition had not been adopted. I would have proposed to add to the original proposition of the gentleman from Indiana the following:

But nothing herein contained shall be construed as preventing any such railroad from bringing suit in the Court of Claims for the charges for such transportation, and recovering the same, as though the foregoing proviso had not been adopted.

I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] has a proposition of amendment which substantially covers this ground. If so, I shall be satisfied with it; if not, then I desire to move to strike out the entire proposition as amended, and to insert the original proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] with the addition which I have indicated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that is an excellent provision; I have no objection to it at all; but the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] must be aware that the action just taken by the House emasculates the amendment I offered. I would withdraw it if I had permission to do so.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman misapprehends my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. There has been no grant made on the condition recited in the proposition which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] managed to get in.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman misapprehends the object of this amendment. I propose to move the original amendment of the gentleman, with mine as an addition.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I propose to offer the entire proposition as a substitute for the amendment as it now stands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say one word on this question. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] knew very well that he was simply defeating my amendment, and the committee, strangely enough, was willing to accept the gentleman's amendment, although it entirely nullified and emasculated my amendment by changing the terms. Every gentleman knows that of the grants of land that have been made for railroad purposes not one has been made on any such condition as is set forth in the amendment as it stands amended by the gentleman. The gentleman from Massachusetts did not misunderstand the sharp practice he is playing here. There never was a grant of lands made on any such condition as set forth in his amendment; nobody ever claimed that there was. My amendment set forth the conditions embodied in the original laws. The gentleman changes the terms; and, as we all know, any officer or department of the Government, before whom this question may come, has only to say "No grant of lands was ever made on any such condition."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana must concede, I suppose, that the substance of the grants which have been made is what is set forth in my amendment, though not in all cases in those words, because the words vary. If that is not the substance of the original grant, it is unjust to impose upon the railroad companies such a condition. If it is the substance of the original grant, the provision, as amended by me, is perfectly just.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana said, what he had no right to say, that I knew or supposed I was defeating his amendment, or "emasculating" it. I have had no such purpose. I have quite as much right to say to him that there are two methods of legislation. One is the method which deals with all persons under the authority of our legislation with equal and exact justice, so that while legislating we consider that our function is like and equal to the function of the judiciary, dealing with all persons alike, and equally and justly. The other method is that of constantly getting up with unjust, impracticable suggestions that do not commend themselves to the moral sense of the House or to the sense of justice of the men who are to vote upon them, and then going home like a demagogue, and saying to the people who do not understand what has taken place, "Lo, I am the only friend of justice; lo, I am the only friend of the people. See how unjust, how much under the influence of corporations, are your Legislatures and your Congress, and everybody else but me"—thus claiming a special character for virtue and patriotism and economy. I will not point out to the gaze of the House the gentleman who fills that picture of a legislator.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have heard frequently the same kind of eloquence on this floor from gentlemen who were interested in or attorneys for corporations. I have heard years ago the same kind of speeches in the interest of this same corporation, owned by British capitalists. I certainly am able to listen to such remarks with great composure (even if the gentleman had referred to me) when I bear in mind that if any power is exacting in this country it is corporations. They allow no divided service. When they are represented on the floor of this House they expect their representatives to forget their obligations to the people and operate alone for their advantage and aggrandizement.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks proper to stand here as the representative of the Illinois Central Railroad—a corporation built up by our munificence, and drawing from the Government to-day, as it did during the war, vast sums of money in violation of its engagements; a company which during the war drew, in violation of law, near $5,000,000 from our Treasury; if the gentleman thinks proper in the presence of this House to stand here in the interest of that corporation, I can well afford to be very patient under any even insulting remarks in which he may think proper to indulge.

I, sir, have sought to represent public interests alone; and whenever it shall be stated of me that I come here as a representative of corporations, or that I have acted in the interest of a corporation in derogation of the rights of the people, that I have resorted to craft and cunning for the purpose of promoting the fortunes of a corporation, then I shall have occasion to blush, but not till then.

I said that the gentleman had sought to emasculate the proposition which I had submitted in the interests of the country, and in a moment when the fact was not clearly perceived, when the object the gentleman aimed at was not distinctly understood, his proposition was unhappily adopted. It is therefore obvious that some such proposition as that of the gentleman from Vermont is necessary to accomplish the manifest purpose of this House; for, however occasionally gentlemen may lend themselves to the sordid purposes of corporate bodies and may be willing to forget public duty in doing so, I feel confident that such is not and never has been the temper of the body of the Representatives of the people on this floor.

The exhibition is not very creditable when a gentleman so far forgets his manhood and duty to his constituents and the country as to be the representative on this floor of a railroad and the grasping purposes of a corporation which draws year after year large sums of money from the Treasury in violation of law and in defiance of the engagement under which the road received the munificent grant from the Government, ultimately to be and now become an imperial possession of wealth.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] mistakes entirely. I shall not have occasion to blush while I stand up and denounce the infamous cupidity by which the wealth of this country is absorbed by a remorseless corporation, and I shall resist the aggrandizement of corporations and consolidated capital at the expense of the just rights of the people. But I shall blush when I can even be suspected of standing on this floor to represent the base cupidity of such corporations. When this House time and again incorporated in appropriation bills provisions to compel this Illinois Central Railroad Company to disgorge money wrongfully taken, compelling the Illinois Central Railroad to disgorge, I never heard even then, when the president of the company was here with the lobbyists, such an unblushing attempt as that made by the gentleman to shield them against the just rights of the people.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I do not know it is necessary for me to say that I had no knowledge, and have no knowledge now, unless the statement of the gentleman who has just taken his seat be considered evidence, what roads have any interest in this question. I certainly was not aware the railroad he has named had. I never knew, and I do not now know, who are the owners, officers, or managers of that road to which he has alluded as interested. The question came up before the House as a question of legislation. The gentleman from Indiana moved an amendment which seemed to me not only totally unjust in itself, but calculated to defeat the object which he professed to desire to accomplish; and I moved an amendment which seemed to me to enact what was exactly just and right in itself, and what would accomplish the purpose he avowed he had in mind.

When I made my suggestion the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] on that side of the House claimed the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana meant exactly the same mine did, and the gentleman from Indiana assented to that claim, resisting my amendment on the ground his meant the same thing. That was said by the gentleman from New York standing by his side, and not denied by him, but assented to by the motion of his head.

Mr. HOLMAN. That statement is not true.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not consent to be interrupted at this moment.

I then asked that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana be read to the House, and the House saw and the gentleman from New York saw that it did not mean what it professed, the same as mine, but meant something very much more and something utterly and totally unjust in itself, to wit, it required these railroads, when in their organic act there was a simple provision they should be public highways, to furnish to the United States cars and officers and all the expenses of running the roads and transporting munitions and troops and supplies at their own charge. I called the attention of the committee to that in fair debate. It was fully understood. It was a simple proposition which any man can understand, and it is a proposition which any man with the sense of justice in his heart would assent to as being fair; and the committee understanding the point, having heard just as much about it as I had, knowing just as much about it as I did, for I heard of the whole subject for the first time when the gentleman from Indiana made his speech, agreed with me and differed with him as to the meaning of his amendment and the fairness and justice of mine. And it is under these circumstances that the gentleman from Indiana, sober as he is presumed to be when he is sitting in his seat, undertakes to get up here and charge one of his fellows and one of his peers on the floor of this House with being the servant of a railroad, with desiring to deceive and entrap this assemblage of intelligent statesmen to accomplish a certain purpose by artifice, with being in the service of a railroad and not in the service of the people. It is not necessary for me wherever I am known to repel with scorn and indignation insinuations of that kind.

I say again there are two ways of legislating and two ways of winning the favor of the American people. One is to deal with justice everywhere, never to break the faith of this people even with a railroad, never to break the faith of this people if it is pledged anywhere, even to a foreigner—to do justice, and let your legislation come, like the sun and rain, equally and fairly upon the just and the unjust. And that is my way, and that is the opinion which led the majority of this House to vote as it has just voted. The other way is to constantly object to everything that is good, bad, or indifferent; not to inquire, in considering a measure, whether the faith of your country is pledged to it, or whether justice and the great interests with which we are charged demand it, but to seek, by undiscriminating, unreasoning, unjust, and constant objection, to get the reputation abroad, with people who do not understand and who do not read the proceedings of this body, of being the special friend of economy. And I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that having drawn that picture, there is no need for me to write under it the name of the person of whom it is a portrait.

Mr. HURLBUT and Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. There are already two amendments before the committee, and debate on them is exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the amendment to the amendment is withdrawn I will renew it.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not propose to take any part in this personal controversy; I do not think it worth while except to the gentlemen who are particularly engaged in it. But this particular railroad to which my friend from Indiana has been devoting so much attention happens to be a rather important one to the State of Illinois. It is not on account of the Illinois Central Railroad that I take up the time of the committee, but from the fact that 7 per cent. of the gross earnings of that railroad make a very considerable portion of the revenues of the State. And therefore it is as a Representative of the people of the State of Illinois, and not of any other organization, that I am here simply to ask of the House that they shall consider carefully and pass judicially upon the point that is sought to be made by the gentleman from Indiana. I have no objection to the broadest possible restrictions being inserted here that are consistent with law and with justice. And I ask the gentleman from Vermont to yield to allow me to offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I would like to have the Clerk read it as a substitute for the whole matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] withdraw his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not. But I do not object to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] being read.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposed amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no allowance or payment shall be made to any land-grant railway for its service, which under its grant it is required to perform without payment from the United States.

Mr. HURLBUT. Now, sir, that, I think, covers the whole fact, justice, and law of this case. It takes out all that which my friend from Indiana calls emasculation, and sometimes other names not quite so nice as that, and presents the simple, straightforward proposition, if we are not entitled, if the Government is not entitled, by law to demand from the Illinois Central Railroad, for example—as that has been made the objective point of the gentleman's attack—or any other land-grant railroad under the same circumstances, more than the custom of the Government and the decisions of the tribunals have yet required. If that is to be the decision of the House, let it be so; but let us not, as this amendment undertakes to do, prejudge and import into the law a construction which, to say the least of it, is debatable. A very strong argument can be made upon the other side—I admit that—as to the true construction of the fourth section of the act granting land to the Illinois Central Railroad:

That the said railroad and branches shall be a permanent and public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charges upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Now, the construction which the company has given to it, the construction which the Government has given to it, the construction which everybody up to this time has given to it, by payments and by decisions in the various Bureaus of the Department, is that the Government has simply the right to the road; that the engine-power, the brain-power, the cars, and personal property, are things to be paid for. And on this basis settlements have been made with the Illinois Central Company. I do not represent that company; but I do represent the State of Illinois, and I desire that its interests shall be protected.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw the amendment, and renew it for the purpose of saying a few words.

If we can eliminate the personal matter which has grown up in connection with this discussion, we may perhaps reach what is the real question before the committee. I understand it to be this: that by the law which has been read the Government is entitled to make use of these railroads free of charge or toll. The gentleman from Illinois thinks it is only the use of the roadway. If it is only that, it would amount to this, that when Government desires to transport troops over the Illinois Central Railroad, for instance, if it can borrow the motive-power and the cars of the Lake Shore Company or Michigan Southern Company, it can make up a train, put its own supplies and its own troops on that train, and run them over the road free of charge or toll for transportation.

Now, it is obvious, Mr. Chairman, that no such right or reservation could ever have been contemplated by the persons who drafted that portion of the law. They never could have contemplated that the Government of the United States could take its own trains, its own motive-power, and enter upon any one of those roads and operate the road, whether the corporation consented that it should do it or not. They never could have contemplated that; and when the law said that the Government was entitled to transportation over those roads free of charge, it must have meant something different from that. But whether that be so or not, there must be a way of deciding by judicial determination.

A similar question arose, as many gentlemen here know, with respect to the Union Pacific Railroad, in regard to withholding from that road the entire cost of transportation of troops and supplies over the road instead of one-half, which I think was the proportion withheld previously.

The objection is made that it is a hardship on these corporations, and is not in pursuance of existing law. But that is a question which is disputed. It is claimed that the Government ought to pay for this service, but it would be better to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold this entire amount, and then allow the railroad company to bring suit in the Court of Claims, and the amendment which I offered accomplishes the same thing in respect to this question. It directs that the whole amount of the accounts for this transportation shall be retained by the Government, and then it allows these parties, if they hold that it is a proper construction of the statute, to bring suit in the Court of Claims for the transportation, and if the court sustains them they will get it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 1754) to amend the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Amos Farling," approved January 5, 1873.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee then resumed its session.

Mr. BURCHARD. The proposition of my colleague [Mr. HURLBUT] is right enough, but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] applies to a certain class of roads, as he has said, to thirty-nine land-grant roads. It is a definite proposition; it is in accordance with the action of the House in former Congresses providing that there should not be paid from the public Treasury any money for the transportation of troops or property of the United States on these roads. It is said here in argument that this provision simply means that these land-grant railroads shall be public highways, that they shall be free for the United States to put upon them cars and rolling stock for the transportation of troops and property. That is not my understanding of the act. It seems to me that if the act amounts to anything at all, it means that the Government shall not pay for the transportation of troops and property over the road. In declaring the road a public highway, the law merely declared that which is declared in relation to all railroads, that they are public highways. That I believe was the report of the Committee on Railways and Canals to the House, and it is the express decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in a late case. It is said that this does not mean that the rolling stock can be used on a railroad, but the court has decided that the rolling stock on a railroad is a part of the railroad, and is realty as much as the road-bed. I believe that the law, and the meaning of the statutes is, that the Government shall have a right to the transportation of troops and munitions of war over the road free of charge. It may, sir, be an open question, but it is a question that can be decided by the courts, and I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] and for the original proposition made by the gentlemanfrom Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I renew the amendment to the amendment; and I do it to say that in one or two respects the amendment, I think, would prove defective, and for the further reason that I desire on this, the first opportunity offered, to express my concurrence with the gentleman from Indiana in his opinion as to the duty of the Congress of the United States, and further to thank him for having brought the attention of the House and the country to the practical construction given to the plain words of the English language in respect to the relations of these railroads to the Government of the United States. No language could possibly be incorporated into a statute which would express more strongly the purpose of this Government to receive a consideration for a valuable grant of public lands than the language put into this act. If any gentleman on this floor can suggest words plainer than these, "a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge," all I can say is that I do not know the words in Webster's Dictionary that would express it more clearly.

I wish also to call the attention of the House to a particular fact of history known to me, and known to many other western men: that in the eagerness manifested by the people of the regions where these railroads were to be built, they failed, when the railroads were built, to insist themselves upon their rights, and allowed an erroneous construction to be put upon this law in the ex parte interest of railroad corporations. The question is now raised, when the amount of transportation by the United States does not equal the interest returned to the corporations as the result of the capital represented by the grant of land, when the United States will not, under this provision, get even a percentage of interest upon the value of the property appropriated by the Government to these railroads, I say that now is the time when this House cannot afford to ignore the obligations which these corporations owe to the Government of the United States.

I earnestly hope that the amendment to be made to this bill will be in such explicit form that it will be a reassertion on the part of this House of their belief that this law requires these roads to make this transportation "free of toll or other charge." The justice is with the United States; the law is with the United States, if a man of common sense can construe the meaning of such words as these, "free of toll or other charge."

Under these circumstances, I hope that if an amendment is to be adopted, it will be in the form submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] with the addition, slightly varied, suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] I have no objection that these parties shall have the right to go before a court of the United States and ascertain whether these words of the English language mean what we believe them to mean. But I think it ought not to be in the Court of Claims, as provided by the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont. Instead of that, I submit to him that he should provide that these railroads may bring a suit in any court of the United States having jurisdiction; then strike out the words "the same as though the foregoing provision had not been adopted," and substitute in lieu the words "if found entitled thereto by virtue of the language of the law making the grant."

I make this suggestion for this reason: the Court of Claims is not a court of high legal character like the courts of the United States. It is to a large extent ex parte in its examination. I desire that the suit be brought in the circuit or district court of the United States, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Let us have this question fairly settled. If these railroads are entitled to this money, then, in the name of justice, let them have it. But in our view of the meaning of these words, "free of toll or other charge," we ought not to let the present practice continue of paying thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States in the very face of that language. And I ask that this House may in some proper manner reassert that we believe exactly what the original act says.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say that I very cordially concur in the views which have been expressed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and some other gentlemen here. My only purpose was to bring this subject before the House in a tangible form, in such manner as would declare the views of the House as to the interpretation that should be given to the law. I have no objection whatever to the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] that these corporations, if they think proper, may go into a Federal court and there obtain a determination of the question whether they are entitled to any compensation from the Government for this transportation.

Perhaps I ought to apologize to the House for bringing this subject forward at all. Only the fact that a vast sum of money has been taken from the Treasury year after year by these corporations, as I think in violation of law, would have induced me to have done so. I ought, perhaps, to be the more modest on this subject when I bear in mind that the interests of these great corporations are generally represented with earnestness on this floor, and that every question affecting them is sure to be met here with great power of resistance.

I see that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] is again in his seat. That gentleman says that I do him very great injustice by suggesting that he purposely offered his amendment to defeat the proposition I had submitted. He might have admitted the fairness of that suggestion, for his amendment does completely change my proposition. My proposition aims at withholding the money from corporations which have been built under certain conditions. He simply changes those conditions to others that never existed.

His somewhat garrulous remarks, pleasant enough in their way during the periods of relaxation of this House, are, I think, at the same time beneath the dignity of a member upon this floor. This subject is not one of pleasantry to the vast mass of people who are borne down by the burden of taxation, and who have some interest in questions like this, especially questions involving the drawing from their hard earnings vast sums of money for the benefit of corporations, in violation of the rights of the people themselves and of law.

But the gentleman should remember another thing: that he was scarcely as modest as one of his colleagues in the last Congress, who, being president of a railroad corporation, was voting in its interests. That gentleman, when detected and pointed out by a gentleman from New York, blushed at the moment. But the gentleman who is so eager on all occasions to defend the rights of these corporations, after being detected in his crafty performance in the interest of a corporation, scarcely blushed. He did retire a moment from the House. Yet his colleague, who had the hardihood to vote upon a question in which he was directly interested as the president of a railroad corporation, was inclined to make a proper apology, while the gentleman from Massachusetts to-day, conscious of the countenance of a railroad corporation, is arrogant and presumptuous.

I say again, these corporations never allow a divided service; and a gentleman who can cringe to the purposes of such a corporation, can cower in their presence and court their favor, need not seek to call any other gentleman on this floor to account.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a single word? He does not mean me, does he?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am alluding to the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] The gentleman [Mr. BUTLER] is not the only member from Massachusetts, by any means.

Sir, I am not voting on this floor in the interest of corporations. I do not resort to crafty practice for the purpose of voting fortunes to corporations. But the gentleman from Massachusetts may, as long as he lives, disclaim having acted in the interest of this corporation, and yet I think those who know him will have grave doubts as to the fact. Will the gentleman look on this picture, and see whether he cannot determine who it is that is seeking to extract money from the Treasury in the interest of sordid corporations?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the substitute of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have modified the last paragraph. I ask that the amendment be read again.

The substitute was read as follows:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which, in whole or in part, was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land, on the condition that such railroad should be a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge for such transportation; nor shall any allowance be made out of any money appropriated by this act for the transportation of officers of the Army over any such road when on duty and under orders as military officers of the United States. But nothing herein contained shall be construed as preventing any such railroad from bringing a suit in the Court of Claims for the charges for such transportation, and recovering for the same, if found entitled thereto by virtue of the laws in force prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Vermont will modify his amendment by inserting, instead of "Court of Claims," the words "Federal court having jurisdiction."

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The Court of Claims has jurisdiction. The attorneys of the United States can appear there just as well as in any other court.

Mr. RICE. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Whether this substitute be adopted or rejected—whether any or all of the amendments that have been offered be adopted or rejected—can or will that make any difference in the existing statute law that is to govern this whole subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the amendment as changing the statute law.

Mr. WHEELER. After this long debate I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations believe that the roads in the West which have received land grants, and which have a contract with the Government in relation to the transportation of troops and munitions of war, should be placed by legislation upon precisely the same footing on which we have placed the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads; and they believe that this proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, as amended by the gentleman from Vermont, works that result. They are therefore in favor of it.

The question being taken on the substitute offered by Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, it was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] as amended by the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. COBURN. I offer the following, to come in after the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. HOLMAN:]

Nor shall any sums be paid for carrying or transportation of any kind to any railroad company or companies which purchased railway material and rolling stock under the provisions of executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865, and which are indebted to the United States therefor at the time said carrying and transportation are furnished, and which refuse or neglect to give to the Quartermaster's Department an order for such amount upon the Post-Office Department.

Mr. Chairman, the rolling stock and other property of several railroad companies in the South were, after the war, purchased from the Government by those companies upon condition that the earnings made by carrying the mails, troops, supplies, and freights at Government rates, should be retained by the United States. These railroad companies have carried considerable amounts of Government freight, and are constantly carrying the mails. There is a large indebtedness outstanding against them, the aggregate amount being over $4,000,000. Some of the companies have made settlement, and some have not. The companies thus indebted refuse to give an order upon the Post-Office Department for this money which is due to the Quartermaster's Department. The understanding originally was that this settlement should be made in the Quartermaster-General's Department; but these companies, for a reason best known to themselves, refuse to give the order.

The effect of the order would be to estop the companies from ever again claiming this money. Some of them, it is understood, do not intend to pay this, are fighting for reductions, and have been sued and judgment obtained; there is constant struggle between some of them and the Government about this matter of carrying mails and freights.

I have in my hand the report of the Quartermaster-General, in which he refers to this difficulty. He says these companies refuse to give the order which would estop a claim of any part of this money by the railroad companies. To carry out the provisions of law in existence for some time and to carry out the well-understood agreement with these companies, I can see no objection to it, and think it ought to pass.

Mr. BROMBERG. Will the gentleman from Indiana specify the roads to which he alludes?

Mr. COBURN. There are quite a number of railroads still indebted to the United States. I believe there are about twenty of them.

Mr. BROMBERG. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana there are two sides to this question, and the House should be careful before it adopts any amendment so sweeping in its nature. Some of the roads in the South had settlements made by special acts. Others exactly of the same nature are still pending, and the roads, instead of availing themselves of the special act, rely upon a general act to be passed on this subject. There is now before the Judiciary Committee a bill covering this very case. It is as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 122) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes."

Whereas the Secretary of War was directed and authorized by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, to compromise certain suits instituted by the United States against certain railroad corporations which purchased material from the Quartermaster's Department, under the provisions of executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865; and whereas issues have been raised and are pending in the settlement of the accounts of other railroad corporations which made purchases under said orders, and against which the Government has not been forced to institute suit: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to compromise, adjust, and settle the same upon such terms as may be equitable and just.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the difference between some of these roads and the Quartermaster-General's Department is this: It is a difference as to the rate of compensation. The roads are not unwilling to pay, but they think the Quartermaster-General is not doing justly by them; that he is acting in an unreasonable manner. They stand ready to pay upon any proper basis.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether the Mobile and Ohio Railroad is one of the roads to which he has referred.

Mr. COBURN. It is, I believe.

Mr. BROMBERG. I will tell the gentleman from Indiana the Mobile and Ohio Railroad is ready at any time to make settlement, but the difficulty is, it cannot come to terms with the Quartermaster-General. The general bill now pending before the Judiciary Committee will allow the Secretary of War to make settlement, and whenever you pass that bill you will have no just cause of complaint against any of these southern railroads.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Chairman, I will read to the House the exact language of the Quartermaster-General on this subject:

The earlier collections, being reimbursements of the Quartermaster's Department for property originally purchased with its appropriations, were applied to its service, reducing the amounts of the annual estimates for appropriations; but since the passage of the law of May 8, 1872, requiring all proceeds of sales of public property to be deposited in the Treasury, to credit of miscellaneous receipts, these collections have taken that course. Fifty railroads originally availed themselves of the privileges of the executive orders. Thirty of them have paid their debts in full with interest. Twenty now remain in debt to the United States on this account.

A full statement of these accounts accompanies this report; to it reference is made for detailed information.

Some of the roads largely indebted to the Government, and which have given bond for the application of their postal earnings to the payment of their debt, refuse or persistently neglect to give the order for the payment of their earnings, which, in the judgment of the Post-Office Department, is necessary before the money can be thus applied. Some of these earnings have thus, under the law, lapsed into the Treasury; other considerable amounts are locked up. They are not turned over to the roads, but not being turned over to this Department it cannot credit the debt account of the railroads with them.

Some provision of law for the collection of this money and settlement of the debt, so far as it will go, is desirable. * * * * * * *

Before the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department whose duty it is to make payment for postal service will place the money to the credit of the Quartermaster's Department, or, in other words, pay it over to this Department, he requires each railroad company, by an agent appointed by its board of directors, to give an order in favor of this Department for the amount due. Until such an order has been given the money remains as a part of the appropriations for the Post-Office Department, and is not transferred to the appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department; neither can it be placed to the credit of the railroad companies on the books of this office.

The Auditor holds that he has no authority to pay to the Quartermaster's Department money due for service rendered by these railroad companies without an order from them requesting that it be done, notwithstanding the fact that it was one of the conditions on which the property was sold that the money, when earned, should be placed to their credit, and notwithstanding the further fact that this office has urged that a contract, executed by this Department by order of the President of the United States, should be respected by the other Departments of the Government. In order, therefore, that the Auditor may pay the money to this Department, or rather, more properly, issue his warrant therefor, so that a transfer of the money to the appropriation for this Department can be made and the proper credit be given, some action by Congress or other competent authority seems to be absolutely necessary.

Now, sir, all that is necessary for us to do is to require that these railroad companies shall not be allowed this credit until they do give that order. There can be no earthly objection to it, because the amount is fixed and agreed upon and the money in the Post-Office Department. And I can see no reason why they should refuse to give this order except that they expect to reclaim this money at some time, and thus to defraud the Government of it. It is in effect a repudiation of their contract. They are bound in justice to put that fund in such shape that the Government can take legal possession of it. Until that is done, it lies there subject to such repudiation as they may see fit to make. It ought to be put in such position that the accounts of the Government can be squared. No injustice can be done to any one by so doing.

Mr. BECK. Before the gentleman from Indiana sits down I would like to ask him whether there is not a special report from the Secretary of War embracing all these subjects and asking for action by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. COBURN. I am not aware of it; I have the last annual report of the Secretary of War in my hands from which I have read.

Mr. BECK. There was a short report from the Secretary of War of three or four pages on this subject, which was handed to me during the last three or four days, but I cannot now lay my hands upon it.

Mr. COBURN. My attention has not been called to it. I do not know whether it is on this or another subject, but this is as proper a place as any other to put this matter, in the form in which the man best acquainted with it desires to have it; that is, the officer of the Quartermaster-General's Department who reports on it, and whose recommendations have received the approval of the Quartermaster-General and of the Secretary of War. Whatever future general action may be deemed necessary can be taken on the report from the Judiciary Committee. At this time it is certainly proper that the railroads that refuse to comply with their contracts should be paid nothing and allowed no credits till they do. It may be proper for Congress to act again. But let us not wait till that time transpires. This is the proper time and this the proper place for doing this.

The bill which the gentleman from Alabama quotes is the best evidence of the unwillingness of these companies to comply with their contracts. It only confirms what I have said. They want to compromise, to hold on to their money, and to worry the Government out of its just dues.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall any sums be paid for carrying or transportation of any kind to any railroad company or companies which purchased railway material or rolling stock under the provisions of executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865, and which are indebted to the United States therefor at the time said carrying and said transportation are furnished, and which refuse or neglect to give to the Quartermaster's Department an order for such amount upon the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BROMBERG. I was not aware that this subject was to be brought up to-day or I would have been prepared; but I ask the Clerk to read the following extract from a report made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] from the Committee on the Judiciary, in the second session of the Forty-second Congress, on this very question, or a similar one.

The Clerk read as follows:

The railroads themselves came before your committee, and, while protesting against legislation designed to affect proceedings in court, expressed a desire for an equitable settlement with the United States of all claims between them and the Government without litigation, asking that the Secretary of War or some competent tribunal may be empowered to compromise and settle the controversies now existing upon the subject of the property now restored to them. The legislation proposed by the Quartermaster's Department seemed very harsh to your committee, if not unjust. If the United States have valid bonds against these railroads, with every power to take possession under them, and those bonds have been given for a valuable consideration, and cannot and ought not to be inquired into, then the Quartermaster's Department have no need of any legislation to enforce the remedy in the most stringent form. If, on the other hand, these bonds are worthless, and the property of the United States has been passed into the hands, improvidently, of insolvent railroads, without any lien upon the franchise, then large amounts due the United States will be sacrificed.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say but a single word in reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.] The whole matter is now before the Judiciary Committee, and there have already been two hearings in relation to it. The facts are, that when the war was over the Government of the United States found itself possessed of an immense amount of rolling stock. The roads themselves in the South had none. The United States appraised their railroad stock, sold it to the roads at their own price, and, as a matter of fact, appealed to them to take it.

Now, these roads gave their bonds in payment of this railroad stock, and in the last Congress, or the Congress before, the Congress of the United States authorized a settlement of certain suits that had been commenced by the Quartermaster-General. Those suits have been settled satisfactorily to the Government of the United States. The whole thing is now in abeyance, and I have no doubt that the Judiciary Committee will report a bill to Congress by which a settlement shall be arrived at in full with all of these railroad companies; and I hope that it will not be disturbed, or in any way mixed up with an amendment to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. POTTER. If the gentleman from Maine will allow me I will add to his statement that the Judiciary Committee will report a bill, if they can, after having heard both parties on this question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is any other amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not; there are already two amendments pending.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should have liked five minutes to show why this amendment should not be adopted; why it will work great injustice. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BECK. I wish to ask the attention of the committee to a report about which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] seems to know nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] will withdraw it I will renew it.

Mr. COBURN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I renew the amendment. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to this fact: that the Secretary of War sent a communication relative to all those matters about which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has spoken. It is Executive Document No. 70, first session Forty-third Congress; and the Judiciary Committee of the House are now, under the recommendation of the Secretary of War, devising measures to settle all these matters. When this is the case, it does seem to me very wrong for this committee to undertake to take away the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee while it is dealing with these questions under the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FRYE. And that recommendation was in answer to a communication from the Judiciary Committee; and we have it before us now.

Mr. BECK. That is true; and that is the reason why I rose to ask the question of the gentleman from Indiana. I have the paper here to show that it is the fact.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I am now in order I will say a word in addition to what has already been said by the gentlemen on the right and left of me. A portion of these railroad companies, against whom suit was brought under an act passed by Congress several years ago adjusted the matter with the Government through the War Department, by making deductions from the amount originally promised which were adjudged upon the evidence to be equitable and right, the terms and times of payment being extended; and they executed their bonds, which would fall due from time to time, and which, so far as they have fallen due, I understand have been promptly met. But under the terms of this amendment those companies, until the last bonds they have given shall fall due, will be utterly precluded from having their pay for transportation, or any other compensation they may prefer, and from having any credit or any allowance for the work, in abate of their debt. The bonds are certainly not due. The other roads, whose case is now before the Judiciary Committee, and whose anticipated action you have heard already announced, will undoubtedly be placed in the same category precisely. None of these roads, so far as I am aware, are in default, in any proper significance of the term "default."

I think late circumstances have shown that the decisions made against the roads whose affairs have been examined into, suffice to show that they are entitled to reasonable relief, and that other roads are precisely in the same condition, and I have no doubt that they will be found to be entitled to the same relief. This proposition is unjust to the roads which have adjusted their accounts with the Government, and equally unjust to those which are taking steps to adjust their accounts in the same way. Sir, the amendment is neither necessary nor proper, and I hope the committee will not adopt it.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. COBURN as amended.

Mr. COBURN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw the amendment to the amendment, so as to allow me to renew it.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COBURN. I renew it. I merely desire to say that we have not now the information necessary to legislate upon this point.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I rise to a point of order. I submit that there are two amendments now pending, and that the power of amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. There were two amendments pending, but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has withdrawn his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COBURN. The House has now an opportunity to vote on this question, and whether it will ever have an opportunity to vote upon it again no man can tell. If the matter is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, they may report or they may not; they may report adversely; who can say? It strikes me that it is the part of practical legislators, when we have a plain provision before us, simply tending to prevent any payments to be made to any of these railroad companies, that we should act upon it at once rather than wait until legislation can be had coming from the Committee on the Judiciary. It may be that in the mean time, before the Committee on the Judiciary can report, some payments may be made to these companies or some indebtedness of the company may be discharged. If we leave this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, it may be that they will not report until the end of this Congress. Gentlemen talk as if the Committee on the Judiciary would certainly report in favor of this measure. They infer also that the measure reported by that committee would pass the House and the Senate, and that the President would sign it. Gentlemen talk as if that was a foregone conclusion. The House has a right to act upon this question practically at once. Our doing so would not obviate the necessity of a full and ample report from the Committee on the Judiciary or of the most thorough action by Congress. Let it be done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to ask the gentleman if the amendment proposed by him does not make the Quartermaster-General the exclusive judge as to the contracts made with these railroad companies, and if it does not vest him with full power to withhold the amount earned by these companies?

Mr. COBURN. It does not, and it does not change the existing arrangement with the railroads. It compels the companies to comply with their plain contracts, and nothing else. This they refuse to do and struggle to avoid.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact: that his amendment operates against the roads that have adjusted their accounts with the Government as well as against those whose accounts are still unadjusted.

Mr. COBURN. If the railroad companies refuse to make the proper returns through the Postmaster-General to the War Department, they ought to be restrained from receiving their pay. They ought to be held to their contracts. These are the very roads that should be promptly informed that they must comply with their contracts.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman is mistaken as to point of fact. The amendment he has drawn up would go a great way beyond the class of roads to which he referred; and I hope his amendment will not be agreed to.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. COBURN as amended, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment as amended, and being put it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next clause of the bill, as follows:

For subsistence of regular troops, engineers, and Indian scouts, $2,452,416.60.

Mr. MELLISH. I move to amend that clause by striking out the word "four," in line 26, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "eight."

I shall not occupy the time of the House more than two or three minutes. I noticed yesterday that my colleague from the city of New York [Mr. COX] after remarking that he was one of "the quiet, unobtrusive heroes of private life who vote to cut down our peaceful Army"—a statement, by the way, the correctness of which I do not propose to call in question—said, in regard to the Indian business, that "we might safely trust it with fewer soldiers than we now have." "Trust it with fewer soldiers than we now have!" Those are the printed words that appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I do not believe that there is a man too many in the Army; indeed, I do not believe that there are enough soldiers at the frontier. The new settlers in the mining and grazing interests, &c., require more, rather than less, protection. Troops, for instance, as I was told this morning, are needed at Fort Smith for the protection of settlers going to Texas.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to a point of order. I desire to know what question is pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] has moved an amendment.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I have not heard his motion announced from the Chair.

Mr. MELLISH. My motion is to strike out from line 26 of the paragraph last read the word "four," and to insert "eight."

Mr. HALE, of New York. Has it been read from the Clerk's desk?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will announce the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MELLISH.]

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 26 strike out "$2,452,000" and insert "$2,852,000."

Mr. MELLISH. It is all very well for men who sit quietly in their parlors to say that our pioneers and our miners are too well protected; or, to use the words of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] to say that we can safely trust them with fewer soldiers. The movement of population and enterprise West is the grandest movement known to civilization. And it is not a representative voice that speaks for the city of New York which cries for the reduction of the force that polices our widely extended frontiers, infested as they are by hostile Indians and lawless characters.

The city of New York is interested in and sympathizes with the growth and prosperity of every part of our wide country, and her interests are bound up with the western march of civilization. She is willing to have and anxious to have protection afforded to our hardy pioneers and miners who go as wealth-producers and benefactors of the race into our western wilds.

I simply desire to correct an impression which might have been made by the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. COX,] that the city of New York regards appropriations to protect our frontiers with a niggardly and parsimonious spirit. The men who take the risks of that rude and dangerous life and brave its hardships should at least have a fair share of protection from that nation whose resources they are increasing more than any other like number of citizens in the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and call for a vote.

Mr. MELLISH. I withdraw the amendment. I made the motion only pro forma.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For incidental expenses, to wit: For postage and telegrams or dispatches; extra pay to soldiers employed under the direction of the Quartermaster's Department, in the erection of barracks, quarters, store-houses, and hospitals; in the construction of roads and other constant labor, for periods of not less than ten days, under the acts of March 2, 1819, and August 4, 1854, including those employed as clerks at division and department headquarters; expenses of expresses to and from the frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to paymasters and other disbursing officers, and to trains where military escorts cannot be furnished; expenses of the interment of officers killed in action, or who die when on duty in the field, or at posts on the frontiers, or at posts and other places when ordered by the Secretary of War, and of non-commissioned officers and soldiers; authorized office-furniture; hire of laborers in the Quartermaster's Department, including the hire of interpreters, spies, and guides for the Army; compensation of clerks to officers of the Quartermaster's Department; compensation of forage and wagon masters authorized by the act of July 5, 1838; for the apprehension of deserters and the expense incident to their pursuit; and for the following expenditures, required for the several regiments of cavalry, the batteries of light artillery, and such companies of infantry and scouts as may be mounted, to wit: the purchase of traveling forges, blacksmiths' and shoeing tools, horses and mules, shoes and nails, iron and steel for shoeing, hire of veterinary surgeons, medicine for horses and mules, picket-ropes, and for shoeing the horses of the corps named; also, generally, the proper and authorized expenses for the movement and operations of an army not expressly assigned to any other department, $1,300,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the words "the purchase of traveling forges, blacksmiths' and shoeing tools, horses and mules, shoes and nails, iron and steel for shoeing." I make that motion because these articles have been estimated for in the Ordnance Department, and are contained in the appropriation for that Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I desire to move to amend the paragraph just read by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That no money greater in amount than that which is specifically appropriated shall for any purpose be expended in the public service by any officer of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to that amendment, but I would suggest that it would come in better at the end of this section.

Mr. COX. I thought of that myself, and was about to make the suggestion. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For purchase of horses for the cavalry and artillery and for the Indian scouts, and for such infantry as may be mounted, $350,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$350,000" and inserting "$300,000." I make that motion because, upon examining the reports, I find that there were purchased last year 2,397 mules, and that there is a large balance of funds on hand for the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of the Army, including baggage of the troops when moving, either by land or water; of clothing, camp and garrison equipage from the depots of Philadelphia and Jeffersonville to the several posts and army depots, and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipments and of subsistence stores from the places of purchase and from the places of delivery under contract to such places as the circumstances of the service may require them to be sent; of ordnance, ordnance stores, and small-arms from the founderies and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; the purchase and hire of horses, mules, oxen, and harness, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, and drays, and of ships and other sea-going vessels and boats required for the transportation of supplies and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters, transportation of funds for the pay and other disbursing departments; the expense of sailing public transports on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific; for procuring water at such posts as from their situation require it to be brought from a distance; and for clearing roads and for removing obstructions from roads; harbors, and rivers to the extent which may be required for the actual operations of the troops in the field, $4,000,000.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. WHEELER. Let us go on for ten minutes longer.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I would have no objection to that myself, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] wants the floor for some purpose before we adjourn this afternoon.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I will make the motion myself, that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLOGG reported that in pursuance of the order of the House the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being House bill No. 1009, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPORT ON IRRIGATION.

Mr. HAYS. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which a resolution was adopted this morning calling upon the Commissioner of Agriculture for a portion of his annual report.

Mr. KASSON. I will move to lay that motion on the table, unless the gentleman desires to make some explanation.

Mr. HAYS. I have here a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture which I desire to have read. This matter called for is to be embraced in the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture. It is not necessary that he should be called upon to furnish it when he intends it to accompany his annual report.

Mr. BECK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What classes of references is it necessary to have in order to prevent such a thing as this happening? I supposed that none of these matters could be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. This is not the case of a reference, but of a resolution agreed to by the House. A resolution was this morning adopted, directing the Commissioner of Agriculture to furnish to the House a certain report on irrigation made by the minister of the United States in Italy. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] moves to reconsider the vote by which that resolution was adopted.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the letter of the Commissioner be read.

Mr. BURCHARD. What is the wish of the Committee on Agriculture in this matter?

Mr. HAYS. It is the wish of the Committee on Agriculture that this document be published in the report of the Commissioner at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. The letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 28, 1874.

SIR: My attention was called this morning to the resolution of Mr. KASSON, referred to in your communication, and I wrote a note to him to say I had such an article from Mr. Marsh, which had been prepared at my instance for the annual report of this Department, and that it would be doing injustice to Mr. Marsh to send it to Congress. It would necessarily exclude it from the report of this Department.

Respectfully,

FREDERICK WATTS,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Hon. C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BURCHARD. I am inclined to think that this document had better come to this House than go into the Agricultural Report. The people generally are not so much interested in this subject of irrigation as are those on the western plains.

Mr. HAYS. The paper is properly a part of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that we take a recess till half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. KASSON. Let us finish the matter that is now pending.

The SPEAKER. If the House should take a recess, the session of this evening will be for the consideration of the report on the revision of the laws. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] who has been presiding at the evening sessions desires to be excused this evening. The Chair requests the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. EAMES, to preside this evening.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not think that the Committee on Revision of the Laws desire the House to meet to-night.

The SPEAKER. The practice has always been that when an evening session has been ordered, it could be dispensed with by the adoption of a motion to adjourn, instead of a motion for a recess. It is the duty of the Chair to state that an evening session has been ordered; but, of course, it is within the power of the House to hold a session or not, as it may please.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not think the committee desire a session this evening.

Mr. LAWRENCE. O, yes; we are ready to go on to-night.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ELDREDGE that the House adjourn, it was not agreed to, there being ayes 34, noes not counted.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. EAMES in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873." The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, the committee find it necessary to return to the chapter upon the organization of the Army, title 14, beginning at page 256. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] will offer some further amendments to that portion of the revision.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to offer an amendment to section 1113.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1113. Post ordnance sergeants shall be selected by the Secretary of War from the sergeants of the line who shall have served faithfully for eight years, including four years in the grade of non-commissioned officer.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by adding at the end of this section these words: "and shall be assigned to their stations by him." This section is drawn upon the act approved April 5, 1832, chapter 67, section 2, and paragraph 134 of the Revised Army Regulations of 1863, which now have the force of law. That paragraph contains the provision which I move to add. The entire section as there found is as follows:

Ordnance sergeants shall be selected by the Secretary of War from the sergeants of the line who shall have served faithfully for eight years, including four years in the grade of non-commissioned officer, and shall be assigned to their stations by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next section to which I desire to offer an amendment is section 1129.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1129. Post and regimental chaplains shall make monthly reports to the Adjutant-General of the Army, through the usual military channels, of the moral condition and general history of the regiments or posts to which they may be attached.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by inserting after the word "post," at the beginning of the section, the word "hospital." This provision is drawn upon the act of April 9, 1864, chapter 53, section 3, which contains the word I have suggested.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I also move an amendment to section 1130.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1130. It shall be the duty of commanders of regiments and posts to afford to chaplains assigned to the same for duty such facilities as may aid them in the performance of their duties.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by inserting after the word "regiments," in line 1, the word "hospitals." This section is also drawn upon the act of April 9, 1864, chapter 53, section 3, which contains the word I have suggested.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We have sought advice from the War Department upon a number of these provisions, and that Department suggests that there should be an addition to section 1131 of this revision, But the suggested addition is from a proviso of the act of July 28. 1866, chapter 229, section 10; and it will be found in section 1195 of Durant's revision. I make this statement merely to correct the error into which the War Department has fallen. The proposed addition is already in the revision.

On page 262, section 1131, I move, in line 3, to strike out "one" and insert "two;" add "s" to the word "adjutant;" in line 4 to strike out "three" and insert "four," and in line 5 to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve;" so it will read:

The Adjutant-General's Department of the Army shall consits of one Adjutant-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; two assistant adjutants-general, with the rank of colonel of cavalry; four assistant adjutants-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry; and thirteen assistant adjutants-general, with the rank of major of cavalry.

The reason for that is this: similar amendments will occur in a number of places. The act of March 3, 1869, section 6, volume 15 of the Statutes, page 318, made this provision:

NEW APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Until otherwise directed by law there shall be no new appointments and no promotions in the Adjutant-General's Department, in the Inspector-General's Department, in the Pay Department, in the Quartermaster's Department, in the Commissary Department, in the Ordnance Department, in the Engineer Department, and in the Medical Department.

The act of June 10, 1872, 17 Statutes at Large, page 382, section 1, changed the act of March 3, 1869, by striking out the provision restricting appointments in the Engineer Department. The commissioners who revised these statutes held this provision made a limitation on the number of officers in these several Departments as they existed by prior laws. The War Department, however, construed these laws not to abolish the original number of offices but only to impose restraint on the power to fill them, so that at any time if Congress should repeal these provisions to which I have referred the offices would exist and they could be filled. It becomes necessary, therefore, in adopting this construction, which is that agreed to by the committee, to strike out the several numbers of these various offices as they were adopted by the commissioners and as they have been adopted in Durant's revision, and to restore the original number, but leaving in force this prohibition upon the filling of the number.

Here is a statement of Mr. Durant, which is correct except only he has overlooked the fact the first act I have cited is already in the revision:

The commissioners seem to have understood this section as limiting the number of commissions in the departments referred to, and they consequently reported the number of offices they ascertained as then existing, and fixed that as the number allowed by law; under which view it was unnecessary to report the above quoted section in the revision.

Concurring in this view that report of the commissioners was adopted. But it appears to be the opinion of the Committee on Revision of the Laws that the section quoted does not abolish the offices, but merely takes away the power to fill them. Under this view, all the figures have been changed in the section of the bill fixing the number of officers in these departments; and hence it will be further necessary to insert the section above quoted, now become necessary, as a part of the bill. It should go in next after section 1218.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. On page 262, section 1135, I move three amendments on the basis of the statutes to which I have referred. I send them to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, strike out "five" and insert "six;" in line 5, strike out "fourteen" and insert "twelve;" in line 8, strike out "nine" and insert "sixteen," so it will read:

SEC. 1135. The Quartermaster's Department of the Army shall consist of one Quartermaster-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; six assistant quartermaster-generals, with the rank of colonel of cavalry; ten deputy quartermaster-generals, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry; twelve quartermasters, with the rank of major of cavalry; thirty assistant quartermasters, with the rank of captain of cavalry; and such number of military store-keepers, not exceeding sixteen, as may be required, with the rank of captain of cavalry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1136. It shall be the duty of the officers of the Quartermaster's Department, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to purchase and distribute to the Army all military stores and supplies requisite for its use which other corps are not directed by law to provide; to furnish means of transportation for the Army, its military stores and supplies, and to provide for and pay all incidental expenses of the military service which other corps are not directed to provide for and pay.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The War Department called the attention of the committee to section 1135, and in connection with that to section 4 of the act approved June 3, 1862, section 233, page 47, of Mr. Durant's revision. On careful examination the committee came to the conclusion there is no conflict with the act of 1862 referred to, and that the provision in connection with section 223 contains everything requisite; which is as follows:

SEC. 223. The transportation of troops, munitions of war, equipments, military property, and stores, throughout the United States, shall be under the immediate control and supervision of the Secretary of War and such agents as he may appoint.

I now come to page 262, section 1138, which is as follows:

SEC. 1138. The officers of the Quartermaster's Department shall, upon the requisition of the naval or marine officer commanding any detachment of seamen or marines under orders to act on shore, in co-operation with land troops, and during the time such detachment is so acting or proceeding to act, furnish the officers and seamen with camp equipage, together with transportation for said officers, seamen, and marines, their baggage, provisions, and cannon, and shall furnish the naval officer commanding any such detachment, and his necessary aids, with horses, accouterments, and forage.

The War Department called the attention of the committee to section 4 of the act approved July 20, 1862, chapter 15, as qualifying section 1138. The committee think it does not qualify it, and that taken in connection with section 223, page 47, of Durant's revision, the provision is correct.

I now move, on page 262, section 1139, in line 1, after the word "quarters" and before the word "shall," to insert the words "and buildings and structures of a permanent nature;" so it will read:

SEC. 1139. Permanent barracks or quarters and buildings and structures of a permanent nature shall not be construcied unless detailed estimates shall have been previously submitted to Congress and approved by a special appropriation for the same.

That is found in the act of March 3, 1869, chapter 83, and section 1 of the act of May 4, 1872, chapter 172.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. By virtue of the statutes to which I have referred I move also the following amendment to the same section:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 1139 the words "except when constructed by troops; and no such structures, the cost of which shall exceed $20,000, shall be erected unless by the special authority of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My next amendment is to section 1142, on page 263.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1142. The Quartermaster-General, under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall prescribe and enforce a system of accountability for all military supplies to the Army, or to officers, seamen, and marines.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 3 strike out the word "military," and insert the word "quartermasters."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is in section 1143, on the same page.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1143. The Subsistence Department of the Army shall consist of one Commissary-General of Subsistence, with the rank of brigadier-general; two assistant commissaries-general of subsistence, with the rank of colonel of cavalry; two assistant commissaries-general of subsistence, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry; eight commissaries of subsistence, with the rank of major of cavalry; and thirteen commissaries of subsistence, with the rank of captain of cavalry.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 7 strike out "thirteen," and insert "sixteen."

That grows out of the statutes to which I referred as fixing the number of officers.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not know if the gentleman from Ohio intends to advocate the amendment he now offers or not. If he does not, I rise to oppose that amendment; and I do so for the purpose of calling the attention, as I hope of the country, to this most absurd and ridiculous farce that is being played here in the way of amending and revising the statutes of the United States. In my judgment there never was so absurd a proceeding as this is. I think we can count six or seven members—perhaps in all twenty, boys and men—who are taking part in this amendment and revision of the statutes of the United States.

I submit to the gentlemen present whether there ever was so absurd a proceeding. And yet the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] whose opinions I respect, whose friendship I am proud to say I think I have, tells us he does not think the country will be satisfied with the Committee on Revision of the Laws attending to this matter in their committee-room in their private sessions. He thinks the country demands something more. I submit to him, was there ever so ridiculous a proceeding as to suppose or to give out to the country that this committee here are the House of Representatives? Does my friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] think that he, and the gentleman from Vermont, and myself, and the few other gentlemen here—the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I would not neglect in my suggestion of the attendance to-night—that we compose the House of Representatives, or that we add dignity and character to these proceedings?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will my friend from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Certainly. I should be glad to have the gentleman ask me a question. I think that would be the best part of this proceeding.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to ask my friend whether the four gentlemen he has named do not count just as many as any other four gentlemen in the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think they would if some of them had not got their heads battered in that investigation during the salary proceedings. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. They still count.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In my opinion, before that, I should have picked out the gentleman from Ohio as the very first among the distinguished individuals who are present. But seriously and candidly, I submit to the gentlemen who are present, is it not a farce we are playing? Is it not an attempt to cheat the country with the pretense that the House of Representatives is revising the statutes of the United States when you cannot count a baker's dozen who are taking part in the proceedings? Is it not an absurdity? Is it not ridiculous? Do we expect to cheat the people of this country by any such performance as this?

I have been here during most of the meetings that have been had upon the revision of the statutes of the United States, and I submit that it would be much more respectable, there would be much more dignity, much more of character in the committee of distinguished gentlemen who compose the Committee on Revision of the Statutes, if they were to take up this work in their committee-room and, calmly, candidly, and carefully examining these statutes, see whether they conform to the existing laws or not, rather than that they should come here and undertake to palm off on the country the idea that the House of Representatives, with their great salaries of $5,000 a year, are performing this duty themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I intend now, and from this time on, to say to the country, and I intend to say to the gentlemen who are managing this matter, that there shall be a quorum of this House or this proceeding shall not go on. I come here to-night for the very purpose of telling you gentlemen and the country that the revision of the laws shall not be made in the presence merely of six or eight gentlemen; that you shall have a quorum or that the proceedings shall not go on. I say the country shall know what is being done here, and you shall not palm off upon the country the idea that the House of Representatives are revising the laws when there are not over ten or twelve men present in this House. I come here to give you notice to-night that you shall not proceed in that way if my feeble effort can resist your purpose.

Mr. STORM. I think the committee that have this revision in their charge and the gentlemen who have seen fit to come here to-night have not deserved at the hands of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] the rebuke he has attempted to administer to them. If the gentleman wishes to lecture those who do not come here, let him seek a proper occasion for doing it. If there be but a few gentlemen who come here and spend evenings in this laborious work of the revision of the laws, they certainly do not deserve censure at the hands of a gentleman who comes here to-night, perhaps for the first time, and attempts to lecture the members of the House who come to perform their duty. I agree with the gentleman if he will seek to enforce the attendance of a quorum of the Honse of Representatives; but I do not think that those members now present have deserved the lecture which the gentleman has seen fit to administer to them. Gentlemen who come here to attend to this business should not be ridiculed and abused in that way. They come here, sir, to make an effort to revise the laws of the country. It is not their fault that there is not a larger attendance than is here to-night. Sir, I think the remarks of the gentleman were, to say the least of them, unkind.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the amendment is still debatable I wish to say a word or two. I would have preferred to have heard from the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] before speaking, but my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] hardly expressed himself with his ordinary courtesy. He has delivered to the House a lecture. I believe it is the first time that I have seen him here on such an occasion as this, and I am gratified to see him and congratulate him upon his presence. But, sir, there are six or eight persons here to give attention to the revision of the laws of the United States. I wish to say that I admire the presence of those gentlemen here, and if I were inclined to be particular in my admiration I would give it to my friend from Pennsylvania, because of his recent appearance on such an occasion as this.

Mr. Speaker, it is a burlesque, an absurdity, a farce, a lie, for us to be here pretending to revise the laws of the United States. It is a clerical business which an experienced clerk could perform better than the House. One clerk would be much more competent and could perform this duty better than the House could. The committee of the House, with ten members present, to undertake a revision of the laws of the United States, is not only an absurdity, but a fraud upon the country. That is a fact, sir. The House is not here, and I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] and in his judgment I have great confidence, if any clerk of any committee would not do this work better than the House could do it in its present condition? Sir, I did not come here to lecture the House. The gentleman says that if I want to lecture the House I should take some other opportunity than this. Sir, if I wanted to lecture the House, of course I would take some other opportunity, because the House is not here now, and the Lord only knows where I should have to go to find them in order to give them a lecture. But I give notice to gentlemen on the other side that if the statutes of the United States are to be revised they should be revised by a quorum of the House, and the country should not be cheated by any such statement that the statutes of the United States are being revised by the House of Representatives, when only the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] and my particular friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] are here attending to that revision.

Mr. STORM. I desire to say that I was in favor in the beginning of accepting this revision on the faith of the gentlemen who have it in charge, and I am so in favor of it to-night. But we are now here by order of this House, not of our own accord, not to attempt to palm off on the country a fraud, a cheat, and a lie, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] would have it. We are here to-night in pursuance of an order of the House, and are attempting to obey that order. The gentleman from Wisconsin has said to the members present here to-night that we are attempting to palm off on the country a sham, a fraud, a cheat, and a lie. In the beginning I said, as I say now, that I would have been willing to accept this revision upon the faith of the committee which had it in charge. But we are here to-night from no action of mine, but by order of the majority of the House, to see to this work of revision.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is a very well-known fact, and one not creditable to ourselves or to the country, that a large portion of the business of Congress, especially of the House of Representatives, and perhaps it is the same with the Senate, is transacted without the presence of a quorum. It certainly was a very proper movement on the part of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to insist that the passing over of the pages of this compilation of the statutes should be done in this public manner, so that every gentleman who desires to be familiar with the text of what we hope will be the revised statutes of the United States should have an opportunity to be present and to participate in the action of the House upon this subject.

Now, scarcely a week passes over our heads when there is not important business transacted in this House by much less than a quorum. It is found that the process by which a quorum of the House is called together, especially at night sessions, by means of a call of the House, is attended with so much weariness on the part of those who attempt it that under no ordinary circumstances will that effort be made. I think the gentleman from Vermont would deem it wiser to adjourn at once than to attempt to force the presence of a quorum by means of a call of the House.

Nothing is more common than this very method of doing business which we are now pursuing to-night. Every Representative is properly held responsible for what transpires here. This is not the business of a committee; it is not done in a committee-room, in a place where all the members are not expected to be present. It is done in the Hall of the House, a place devoted to legislation. And for the action so done here every member of the House is held responsible. Unquestionably some errors will be found after all the pains taken. And after the remarkable application of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] and others who are engaged in this revision, it will still be found that mistakes have crept in this comparatively small volume instead of the seventeen large volumes of our statutes which now exist; and if some of those mistakes should happen to be important, it is not for those who attend here to be charged with having in secret, in their committee-room, designed to allow these mistakes to occur. Every member of this House at least will be estopped from raising any such objection to what may transpire here to-night. It is their duty to be present in this Hall. This attempt is made in open session, just as other business is transacted constantly, to complete the compilation of our statutes. Progress has been made in that work. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself have been absent perhaps one night since these night sessions were commenced. I think gentlemen who are present, and who have generally been present, have at least diligently performed their duty.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] have both spoken so sensibly in relation to this matter that it is hardly necessary for me to say a word. Every gentleman who has given any attention to the statutes at large, and the condition they are now in, must be aware of the indispensable necessity of having a revision of them. I do not believe that in any civilized country in the world there ever was such a jumble of statute law as we have in the United States. And I think if my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] had given as much study to this subject as I have, he would very much doubt whether a competent clerk could perform this work.

There are a great number of contradictory statutes. It is sometimes a most difficult matter to tell what the law is. In some respects the duty of the committee is judicial; we have to exercise our judgment in determining from the variety of contradictory statutes what is really the law. The gentleman says that we ought to do this in our committee-room. Sir, we do do it in our committee-room. We present no amendment or provision here that has not been carefully studied and considered in the committee-room.

Now, if I understand my friend—and he is perfectly right in saying that we are friends in every good sense of that word—what is it that he is complaining of? Why, sir, that there is not a quorum of the House present. Sir, what are we doing here? If we were making new laws, if we were devising something that we were going to put forth to the country as new legislation, then there would be manifest propriety in saying that there should be a larger number of members present than we now have. We are only essaying to produce and put in form what is the existing law, what in part has been the statute law from the foundation of the Government down to this time.

Now, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] very well said, if the House had been willing to intrust this work entirely to the committee, if it had passed a resolution instructing us to incorporate our amendments into this revision that they might be passed through the House without examination, it never would have answered for any committee to be thus taken upon trust. As my friend said, and very well said, there will undoubtedly be some omissions, some mistakes, some errors in this work after we have done the very best that we possibly can. If the House should adopt without examination our work as done in the privacy of the committee-room, and if somebody should be harmed by something that might be done there, it never would do for any committee, for any eleven members, to take that responsibility upon themselves. We must bring our work here where everybody can have an opportunity to see what we have done and that there is nothing secret about it.

The gentleman from Wisconsin says we ought to have a quorum. Now I understand very well that even as to members who are lawyers, unless they will sit down and make this a study, as we of the committee are obliged to do, their presence here would be of very little use. I do suppose that if this work ever comes to a completion and is adopted it will have to be done mainly upon the confidence and faith that the House has in the gentlemen who made the revision and in the committee who examined it. In the multitude of duties that devolve upon members of this House, almost every one of them is so burdened with other things that, if he is not specially intrusted with this business as his particular duty, he knows very well that he can be of very little service in attending meetings here and looking over this revision. He knows that we may as well intrust the work to men who have studied the subject and who will take the trouble to come here and attend to it.

We desired to take this work away from the business of the House. We had got possession of the morning hour with this bill. If it had remained in that position we should have occupied every morning hour during the present session, even if it should last until next October. We said to the House "We desire to get on with this work; we do not wish to obstruct the general legislation of the country; we are willing to come here and work evenings, work extra hours, too, for the purpose of getting through with this business."

Now, if my friend from Wisconsin insists, or asks us to insist, that we shall bring a quorum of the House here at every evening session, the proceeding will be so irksome to gentlemen who take no special interest in it, that we shall not have any evening sessions; the House will vote to dispense with them. Thus practically, (and I desire to appeal personally to my friend upon this subject,) if he insists that this work shall not go on unless we have a quorum of the House present, there will be an end of this revision; then next year we shall have added to the seventeen volumes of the Statutes at Large, the eighteenth volume, the next year the nineteenth; and so we shall go on until this jumble grows vaster and vaster.

The only practical mode of accomplishing anything in this work (and I think my friend will agree with me it is one desirable to be done) is just the very method we are pursuing; and I submit to him that our proceeding is not open to any such charge as that it is a fraud upon the country, or that anybody is to be cheated by it, or is to be dissatisfied with it. I think myself that the gentlemen who feel an interest in this matter, as my friend from Wisconsin does, and who will take the trouble to attend these night sessions to look after it, can do all that is to be done better than if we had the noise and confusion that we have in the ordinary full sessions of the House. I desire to submit to my friend's own good sense and good judgment that he is misleading himself upon this subject; that instead of this work not being so well done with the number we have here as if we had the whole House present, it can in this way be more speedily and better done. With the attendance of gentlemen who feel sufficient interest in this matter to come here and give their attention to it, we can really get along with the work faster and can do it better than if we had present ten times as many men who felt no interest in it, who regarded it with no other feeling than that of impatience and disgust. I think I am right in saying to my friend that if he persists in the position that we must not go forward with this work without the presence of a quorum, it will be the end of the matter.

I have considered this subject with a good deal of care. The law providing for this revision I introduced and had passed nearly eight years ago. I have cherished it all this time; and I do not intend it shall die if careful nursing will keep it alive. But I shall despair of success if my friend persists in saying that we shall not go on with this work unless we have a full House. I do not think we shall be able to secure such attendance; and I submit that it is not necessary for the safety of the country or the success of this revision that we should do so.

Mr. ELDREDGE. My friend from Vermont knows the profound reverence I have for his opinions and judgment. He knows with what confidence I have always looked up to him for counsel and advice; and never more than to-night, perhaps, did I appreciate his wisdom. Nothing has ever arisen to shake my confidence in his judgment. But some of his suggestions, it seems to me, are appeals to expediency and the hope of realizing ideas which I regard as Utopian, rather than a consideration of practical results. If I doubted his judgment, the reverential voice with which he always appeals to me would, I think, overcome me, as I believe it always has done. I never was able to resist his appeals, even when I doubted the expediency of his proposals.

But I submit to him, when he says that this House, or this assemblage, these few individuals here to-night, not to exceed a baker's dozen, I believe, of the members of this House, are more competent, would do this work better, than the House of Representatives or a quorum of the House, whether he is not antagonizing the wisdom of the country in its provision for the numbers which make up this House? And then let me suggest to him, after the House had been provided for in its numbers, and when I constantly had voted for the smallest number, in the interest of economy, in the interest of speedy and good legislation, as I thought, whether he was not the individual to come in, and, in order that Vermont—my own native State and his native State—should have the same number of Representatives in the present Congress she had in the last, consent that Ohio, New York, Indiana, and some other States, should have an additional number on their fractions, in order that Vermont should have a full voice in the House of Representatives; and whether he did not do that in the interest of the country and for the purpose of having a proper, and the most proper, body for the purpose of legislation in this country? He told us, with the same gravity, with the same voice, with the same dignity of manner, with the same earnestness and sincerity with which he speaks to-night, about the few who are here being able to do this business better, of the necessity of having a full House, and especially that Vermont should be fully represented with the same number she had in the last Congress.

Now I submit to him whether it is not a farce to have it go out to the country that the House of Representatives is in session revising the laws, whatever that work may be, when less than the number of the committee, or not to exceed any of the committees of the House, are present here? Why not put it upon the Committee on Revision of the Laws, as I would put it upon them, as I would trust them, as I would hold them responsible? Why not put the whole work upon them, take it upon trust, take it upon their responsibility, hold them responsible that the work is what they profess it should be?

One of the revisers sits by my side. I would rather take his revision in calm consideration of it in his own office, deliberately considering every passage and every sentence, much rather than to take any such pretended revision as is now attempted to be palmed off on the country as a revision by the House of Representatives.

I shall, so far as I am concerned, wash my hands of all responsibility in this revision of the laws. I came here at the first session with some enthusiasm on this subject, with much anxiety that the laws should be revised and codified and presented in a compact form, so not only the legal profession of the country but the people of the country, might have a safe and convenient codification of the laws. But the very first proposition I made in reference to a doubtful construction of a particular paragraph I was met by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] then having the subject in charge, with the statement that the purpose was not to revise the laws but was simply to compile, to put in compact form, in close connection, in a succinct revision, the laws as they now exist. And the gentleman from Vermont told me, instead of sixteen or seventeen volumes as now, their purpose was to put the existing laws into a compact form; but when I suggested to the gentleman the provision I referred to did not express the law, that it was not capable of being understood, I was told the committee intended as one of their purposes no change of the law should be made.

Now I wish to say I have watched with some earnestness and with some anxiety the progress thus far made, and I tell gentlemen there have been radical changes in the law. Yet when I presented a proposition of that kind, I was met at once with the statement no change was to be made. I now know the purpose is to change the law. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] who sits at my left when he is here, brought to the attention of the House a most radical change. There was no explanation of it except there was an erratum, number 3 or 4, which did refer to it. Now the intention was apparent to change the law. When you come to the consideration of the laws for the collection of tariff and taxes we know this revision is an entire change of the law, as gentlemen will learn when they come to vote on them.

Suppose the gentleman from Vermont were to rise in his seat and suggest that a change of the law was being made, and with all the ability of which he is capable—and I know he is capable of exercising very great ability in the advocacy of any measure he undertakes—advocate that suggestion, who is to determine whether he is right or not? Why, it is my friend from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who is not here to-night, and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.] There is no vote. There is no consideration. The subject is not considered. There is no debate upon it. But in the committee these gentlemen have agreed to assign certain pages to the gentleman from Ohio, certain pages to the gentleman from Vermont—and I do not wish to disparage the ability of either of them—and certain pages to the gentleman from Massachusetts; and they go over the book and tell you they want this change of a word here and that change of a few words there. There is no explanation; there is no reference to former statutes; and the thing passes, and it goes out to the country that the House of Representatives have acted in their associated capacity and wisdom upon that question.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has suggested that this is an economical way. Everybody knows how economical my friend from Indiana is. I know that he is. If he has sought any rôle in the world ever since I have known him in the House of Representatives, his tendency has been in the direction of economy. If he has not acted in that way he has certainly been inclined and determined to act in that way. I know it is so, for I have heard him say so a hundred thousand times. [Laughter.] I know that is his purpose; and if he has failed he has failed only because of his inability to go in that direction. And that he is not to blame for; for there are measures brought in here in reference to which my friend from Indiana would practice ecomomy that would cheat the very elect, although I do not know but that he is included among that number himself.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a farce. There is no revision of the laws. I would take it upon the character of the distinguished gentlemen who were intrusted with this business in the first place. I would put the responsibility upon them, and take the work on their reputation and character. But, in Heaven's name, do not undertake to tell the people of this country that the House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States are revising the laws when this meager assemblage is here acting upon it. Do not undertake to palm off any such fraud.

I see before me my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who knows that we are paid very much for our services. He knows we are paid for every hour of the twenty-four, and ought to be here and work that number of hours if necessary in the revision of these laws. Is not that so?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman has always advocated that. Why should not the House of Representatives be here? And why should the gentleman from Vermont tell the country that it is impossible to get a quorum of the House of Representatives here when we are paid the enormous salary of $5,000 a year, and mileage added to that, and perquisites, and all that sort of thing? I tell you how the House can be brought together. Tell them you are to cut down their salaries, and they will all be here. [Laughter.] But to tell the country that the House of Representatives is revising the laws, that it is acting upon this immense volume here, to tell them that the associated wisdom of the United States in its representative capacity here is acting upon this matter, I say, as I said before, is not only a fraud and a cheat, but it is a lie. The House is not here.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, for nearly eighty-five years Congress has been enacting statutes until we now have seventeen large volumes. During that time there never has been an authorized revision of the statutes. Every lawyer knows that there is a necessity for such a revision, and every member of this House knows that unless we secure this revision by the very means we are adopting there will be no revision act.

Now, I understand my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] to say that he is willing to trust the Committee on Revision of the Laws. As one member of that committee, I certainly feel grateful to him for the confidence in the committee which he expresses; but I submit to him and to the House that there are certainly two advantages in the mode which we are adopting over that which he suggests.

In the first place, it is the privilege of every member of the House to be here at these meetings and suggest that there is an error here, or an omission there, or a wrong construction somewhere else, so that every member has an opportunity to be heard and to make any suggestion which he may choose to offer. Since I came here this evening, the gentleman to whom my friend from Wisconsin referred as one of the revisers of these statutes has given me a very valuable suggestion; and he would not have attended a session of the committee, and we would have lost that suggestion at least. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who is not now in his seat, at an earlier session of the House, when we were convened in evening session considering this revision, gave to the House a suggestion which might have been lost but for the evening sessions. So every gentleman has an opportunity to come here. And when we come to the tariff provisions in this bill we will have here my friend from New York [Mr. COX] watching every section and sentence, and our friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] also watching every section and sentence; and we will have the benefit of their knowledge and their watchfulness.

Then there is another reason why this mode has an advantage over that suggested by my friend from Wisconsin, of submitting it to the committee and taking merely what they shall report. Our proceedings here are published. Every member of the House is supplied with this volume—this final revision by Mr. Durant; and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will contain every change that is made in it and everything that is said about it. And every member who is not here will have an opportunity to read the RECORD and see every change that is made in this book; and he can sit down at his leisure and compare all that with the original statutes, and ascertain whether the work we have done has been done correctly.

Sir, the gentleman from Wisconsin is mistaken in saying that this is a fraud upon the country, when he knows that every member of the House knows that this work of the Committee on Revision of the Laws cannot become a law until all the amendments and changes have been made in it and it has been voted on by a full House. Sir, when the bill comes to a final vote it will be voted upon by a full House. There will be an opportunity for every member to ascertain the shape in which it is finally put; every member will have an opportunity to express an opinion for or against it, and see whether the work is correct or not. Now, every gentleman here knows that we are called upon to act on many matters in the House which are examined by but very few members, and we are compelled to act on the faith we have in them. No member can possibly understand all the matters that are brought for investigation before all the committees of the House; it is impossible, utterly impossible. I do not undertake to investigate every appropriation brought before the Committee on Appropriations, for it is more than any man could do. Gentlemen gather what information they can in reference to appropriations, and act partly on faith, having no kind of accurate information. We are liable to make some mistakes. My friend from Wisconsin said that this work of the Committee on Revision of the Laws was divided out amongst its members. That is so. Two hundred pages were assigned to me, and I have spent weeks and weeks in examining the portion assigned to me. But if the gentleman means to say that the work of the several members of the committee was not submitted to the whole committee he is mistaken. Every change made or suggested by a member of the committee has been submitted to and acted on by the whole committee. They have frequently changed the reports of the several members to whom certain portions of the work had been assigned when they have made suggestions of change or amendment. The House has the judgment of the Committee on Revision of the Laws. I think, sir, that, all things considered, it is better for us to go on in the way we are going on. If the gentleman from Wisconsin requires a call of the House, so that members shall attend, I shall make no objection to it. But this is a work of so much magnitude and importance and of so great necessity, that it ought to be done.

Mr. SENER. Under the rules of the House is not a quorum presumed to be present until some vote shows that no quorum is present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the rule of the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. It is with deference that I hazard any remarks or suggestions on the subject which has just been discussed, from the fact that I know so little in regard to the actual character of the work which has been bestowed upon this revision. I have taken it for granted, sir, from the character of the members who compose the Committee on Revision of the Laws, that the work has been well and faithfully done. I have come here every evening on which this matter has been before the House, and I have endeavored to follow out the suggestions of the committee, and learn what was the real character of the work they had done. But I felt myself at a loss, when suggestions have been made by the committee in regard to the proposed amendments, whether those amendments ought to be made or not. It is a work too great for me to undertake to compare the revision laid before us with the seventeen volumes of the Statutes at Large, which have been accumulating in this Republic for the last seventy-five years. It has seemed to me likely that the committee had some plan of the work they had gone over, which, if furnished to members of the House, might be exceedingly valuable.

If this revision had been accompanied with marginal references, quoting the volume and the statute from which the revision was taken, it seems to me that it would have been of very great utility. And now, if the Committee on Revision of the Laws have these references, it seems to me that it would facilitate this work and enable us to do it much better if we had those references before us. If they could be furnished to us, then I have no doubt members who are particularly interested in some particular part of this work would make it a point to examine those references and compare the revision with the original statutes.

It is very true, as has been said by those of the committee who have spoken this evening, that it is not to be expected that all the members of the House will be equally interested in every part of the statutes. But some of the members will be interested in some one part. I met last evening the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and he was under the impression that there was a meeting last night for the revision of the statutes, and said that he must hurry up here, because he believed the revision of the laws in relation to the Indian Department would be under consideration, and he wished to be here in order that he might look into the matter and make some suggestions. This being so, I have no doubt that if the members of this House could be furnished with those way-marks, those tracks, those references, to which they might refer, it would be of very great benefit to them, and would facilitate this work.

Mr. COMINGO. I would inquire of the Chair, what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. COMINGO. Is not all this debate out of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No question having been raised as to the pertinency of this debate to the question before the House, the Chair takes it to be entirely in order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] what his object is in proposing this amendment? The gentleman from Michigan who last spoke [Mr. WILLARD] has suggested what has occurred to me, that if the gentlemen of the Committee on Revision would explain what they mean by their amendments, instead of asking the House to take them upon trust in the wisdom which we all freely accord to them, we would better understand them. There are no marginal notes to this revision. It is said that no legislation is being done; that this is a mere clerical work. If so, then I say that a clerk could do the work.

If this is a work of legislation, then we ought to have a legislative body to do it. No gentleman has yet answered that proposition. It is said by the gentleman from Vermont that this is merely a compilation. And yet he tells us that he is boiling down into one volume the seventeen or eighteen volumes of Statutes at Large. It must certainly be that different language is used to express the same idea, and that we are actually engaged upon new legislation. And why do not gentlemen tell us what their purpose is?

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] appeals to me in such tones that I can hardly resist, for, of course, he knows my weakness. Still my intellect would be better satisfied if he would give a reason for his plaintive and appealing voice. Give me some reason for it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will explain the amendment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have no doubt the gentleman can explain it.

Mr. POLAND. Let me say, as I have said a great many times since we began this revision, that we do not purpose to alter the law one jot or tittle. Most of the amendments which we have proposed to this revision, as it has been laid before the House, are because the committee ascertained, as they believed, that the law was either not correctly stated, or was not fully stated, in this revision.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Allow me right there to call the attention of the gentleman to one thing. I cannot now refer to the particular section; but in regard to one of the sections of this revision I said to him, "If you take it as it literally reads, it will mean entirely different from what the gentleman has stated the purpose of the committee to be;" and did not the gentleman—or perhaps it was the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR]—say distinctly that "no matter what the language was, we admit the doubt, but we cannot change the language; we admit the uncertain reading of the law, but we have only to compile, and not to revise?"

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on Revision of the Laws do not intend that there shall be the slightest change of the law contained in this volume of revision. The original act providing for the revision did authorize the commissioners who were appointed under it to make some changes, and they did so; but the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the last Congress came to the conclusion, and I think wisely, that if we brought in a bill of fifteen hundred compact pages which it was understood had to be got through this House, and have every section scrutinized as we would the sections of a new bill, in order to ascertain what legislation it contained, it would be utterly impossible to get it through this House. I think that some of the difficulties and errors in the work grew out of the fact that instead of one man being employed in the matter three were employed. I think I am a little wiser now on this subject than I was eight years ago when the bill was passed providing for three commissioners to revise the statutes. Most of the difficulties we find in this revision, most of the errors that we have to correct in this work, grow out of the fact that the work was done by three men instead of one. That is rather an argument in favor of small bodies. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is in opposition to your former argument.

Mr. POLAND. Of course the language of this revision is very much changed from the language of the existing statutes. No one can condense seventeen volumes into one and use precisely the same words that have been used in those seventeen. The language is necessarily changed.

Now, this very amendment that my friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has offered, and which he did explain before the gentleman from Wisconsin came in this evening, is a good illustration of the nature of this work; and I will repeat the explanation, not so much for the sake of this particular amendment as to show somewhat the character of the work in which we are engaged.

In 1866 the Army was reorganized, and it was provided how many officers there should be in each of the staff corps—so many colonels, so many lieutenant-colonels, so many majors, and so on to the end of the chapter. That continues to be the law. But two or three years ago, when we had another partial revision of the Army law, it was provided that in all these staff corps there should be no promotions until authorized by further action of Congress. Since that time there have been of course deaths and resignations, so that in each of these staff corps the actual number of officers is considerably below the number that the law provides for The vacancies cannot be filled—there can be no new appointments and no promotions—because Congress has forbidden them. Mr. Durant, who went over the revision, and who was instructed to strike out everything that the revisers had done in the way of change, and to correct any errors he might find, understood the law to be that by the occurrence of these vacancies the actual legal number of officers was reduced; and therefore he changed the work of the revisers by striking down the numbers to correspond with the number actually in office. The committee are entirely satisfied that the revisers were right; that the law still provides for so many positions in all these staff corps, but that the vacancies cannot be filled until Congress gives authority for the purpose. Congress itself has put a practical construction upon the law in this respect, because in the last Congress we passed an act authorizing vacancies to be filled in the Engineer Corps. But the law remains the same as to all the other staff corps. Now, the amendment offered by my friend from Ohio relates to a change in the numbers of one of these staff corps; and there are three or four places where those numbers have to be changed.

Let me say further to my friend from Wisconsin that though the committee may not in every case deem it necessary to take up time by explaining every amendment offered, yet whenever it may be deemed important they will, upon the suggestion of any gentleman, state the reasons for the amendment and give a reference to the statutes, so that it may be ascertained whether what we offer is correct or not. We shall always be happy to make such explanations.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If it will not interrupt my friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] I would like to ask him categorically why he and his associates on the committee (whose character I do not impugn; in whose word I have very great confidence, so that I would take it quite as soon as I would the action of this grand assemblage of the House of Representatives) cannot come here to the House, after, we will say, a month or six weeks or two months, according to the time they may need, and tell the House in just the same voice and with the same good faith that my friend from Vermont addresses us this evening, that there is no change in the revision they submit; that it embodies, so far as they know, exactly what the law now is. And I want to say to the gentleman from Vermont that if his committee should come here with such a statement, they would have my faith and confidence to the same extent that I give it to him in the statement he has now made.

Now, what is the use—no gentleman has answered this question—what is the use of giving out to the country that the House of Representatives is in session to-night? It is not. Such a pretense is an absurdity. If the people of the country have the right to the assembled wisdom of the House; if members, being paid for their services, ought to be here, the fact at any rate is that they are not here; and why should a few members, night after night, come here and undertake or pretend to represent the House of Representatives of the United States of America? I appeal to the gentleman from Vermont whether it is not a cheat, whether it is not a fraud, whether it is not a wrong perpetrated upon the people whom we represent, that we should come here and undertake or profess to act in the capacity of the House of Representatives, when there is not a baker's dozen of members present.

Mr. POLAND. I will suggest one difficulty about the proposition that we should not hold sessions of the House to consider this revision, but should go through with it in committee, and bring in the result all at once. It is said that the world was made in six days; but it was not made by the Committee on Revision of the Statutes; I do not think they could do it in that time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think that is just about as much a humbug as the pretense that it is the House of Representatives now making this revision.

Mr. POLAND. Inasmuch as we desire to bring all our amendments before the House, so that any gentleman taking an interest in them can see from day to day what we are doing, we deem it better that we should keep up with our work and have it acted on as fast as we get it prepared rather than to have it acted on at one time and in a body.

My friend from Wisconsin, who has been a member for some years, knows very well that as we approach the latter part of the session the committees will have their business prepared for the action of the House, and there will be a very great pressure here, so that it would be difficult for us at that stage of the session to secure as much attention as we can get now.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does any gentleman know of any particular laborious work in which the committees or a majority of the House are engaged to-night, so that they cannot be here to participate with the gentleman from Vermont in the arduous duty he is performing?

Mr. POLAND. I was not speaking of this particular evening, but of the latter part of the session. I think the gentleman knows quite as well as I do what is likely to be the condition of the House at that time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I know very well what is likely to be the condition of business as we go on in the session; but I say that it ought to be understood that we are doing one thing or the other. Either the House should attend to this work as it does to its ordinary business, or we should take the statement of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR]—a statement upon their professional or, if you please, upon their official honor—we should thus take this matter upon trust rather than undertake to make a revision and pretend that it is a revision by the House of Representatives.

I would rather take it in that form. There is no use to come here. I have lost all my enthusiasm in the effort and attempt to revise and codify the laws. There is no use of it. These gentlemen have made it. They come here and say they want to strike out a figure here, and they turn over ten or fifteen pages and strike out a figure there, without any explanation of it. I have no doubt of the diligence, industry, and hard work of the committee. I find no fault with them; but this is no way to revise the laws of the United States. It does not amount to anything when we get through with it. We do not know whether they are right or wrong. When they undertake to compile sixteen volumes into one and sixteen sections into one we know perfectly well the frailty of human judgment and of our language, and we know the necessity of having, if there is any importance of having a body of three hundred men to legislate, we know the necessity and importance of having them all here, so we may be benefited by their assembled wisdom on this question.

The gentleman did not meet the point I made.

I came here for the purpose of breaking up any such sort of an assemblage as we have here to-night, and I have not lost that purpose; and, until I can hear some good reason for it, I do not propose to withdraw my objection, for this is not the kind of House we ought to have to consider such an important question.

Mr. COMINGO. I rise to a point of order. I make the point all this debate is out of order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is the best suggestion made to-night. It is one of great wisdom. He is as near as possible to those who are absent on the subject of discussing this bill.

Mr. COMINGO. I insist this debate is out of order.

Mr. SENER. We have been here one hour and a half, and have done nothing. I therefore move the House adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion to adjourn.

Mr. SENER. I will, at the gentleman's suggestion, but will renew it if I find we are doing nothing.

The question recurred on Mr. LAWRENCE'S amendment.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 21, noes 2.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The Chair must have counted the pages. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes have it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. O, no, Mr. Speaker; there is no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin demand tellers?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Of course I do.

Mr. SENER. I move to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to say a word.

Mr. SENER. I must insist upon my motion to adjourn unless it is apparent we can do some business to-night.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that he will intimate to the House, so it will come to the knowledge of members to-morrow, what line of policy he proposes to take hereafter in the event of a quorum not being present. Then everybody will know what will be the action of the House at the next evening session.

Mr. SENER. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How many votes did the Chair count on the last division?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-one in the affirmative and two in the negative.

Mr. STORM. That beats the gentleman's baker's dozen. [Laughter.]

Mr. SENER. I withdraw my motion to adjourn at the suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

Mr. POLAND. I think my friend from Wisconsin must be aware of the fact, if we are to go on with this revision at all, it must be in these night sessions. He says he is willing to trust the committee—that he is entirely satisfied if the committee will examine this subject, and come into the House and say they have examined it, and their amendments are right. I would like to inquire of him whether when our amendments have been carefully considered, and we bring them in here where everybody who chooses to see them can see them, there is any reason why the same faith should not be given to the committee and its amendments when we do this as if we did it secretly in the committee-room. The gentleman must know no committee could stand such responsibility that they in their committee-room should revise the statutes of the country and have that revision taken on faith. If the gentleman persists in calling for a division to-night, of course we must adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Vermont knows how weak I am to any appeals made to me by him with that pleading voice of his, but if I were to yield to my sympathies——

Mr. STORM. I call the gentleman to order. There is no question before the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would yield to the request of the gentleman from Vermont if I were to consult my own feelings, but I believe we ought to have more people, more members here, to do this business than we have to night.

Mr. SENER. I renew my motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I demand the yeas and nays. Only one-fifth of those present are required to demand the yeas and nays.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 6, noes 21.

So the yeas and nays were ordered, more than one-fifth of those present voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 21, nays 9, not voting 259; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Coburn, Comingo, Duell, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Holman, Lamport, Lawrence, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Poland, Henry B. Sayler, Sener, Shanks, St. John, Storm, Stowell, Whiteley, William B. Williams, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashe, Begole, Bromberg, Brown, Cason, Crossland, Danford, McCrary, and George Willard—9.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Wilson, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—259.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 5, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. MORTON. If no Senator desires to hear the minutes read, I suggest that the reading be dispensed with.

There being no objection, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 485) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the schooner Carrie, of Eastport, Maine, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives announcing that the House had passed the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint select committee be raised, consisting of —— Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the matters specified in the petitions of W. W. Corcoran and others; whether unlawful contracts have been made for public improvements in the District of Columbia; whether unlawful assessments and taxes have been levied; the actual cost of such improvements; the amount agreed to be paid therefor; whether correct measurements have been made; the existing indebtedness on account thereof, and what, if any, portion of such indebtedness was created on account of Government property, and may be properly paid out of the Treasury of the United States; and inquire and report what amendments of the organic acts, if any, are necessary to further protect the rights of citizens or regulate the disbursements and collection of moneys; that said committee shall have power to employ a clerk and stenographer; to administer oaths, and send for persons and papers, and shall report to the Senate and House of Representatives.

And that the Speaker had appointed as members of the joint select committee on the part of the House of Representatives Mr. JEREMIAH M. WILSON, of Indiana; Mr. JAY A. HUBBELL, of Michigan; Mr. HUGH J. JEWETT, of Ohio; Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, of New York; and Mr. ROBERT HAMILTON, of New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution at the present time? If so, the first question will be on filling the blank.

Mr. HAMLIN. I had the honor of presenting a paper from the governor of this District in relation to that subject. It was put in my hand; I had no knowledge of it other than was contained in the paper itself. Having presented that paper, I now say under the circumstances that I hope the resolution of the House will receive the unanimous approval of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The first question will be on filling the blank as to the number of Senators to compose the committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest "three."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to fill the blank with the word "three."

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently appointed Messrs. FRELINGHUYSEN, BOUTWELL, and THURMAN the committee on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior in answer to a resolution of the Senate of January 26, 1874, calling for copies of reports of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received several memorials, or papers purporting to be memorials, which, with the signatures thereto, are printed. The Chair, under the rules of the Senate, thinks they cannot be received as petitions, and therefore does not present them.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of B. D. Washburn, praying Congress to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to review an application for a patent forfeited for non-payment of final fee; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Hon. D. C. Leach, R. Goodrich, and 94 others, praying Congress to provide means by which certain parties named may obtain patents for their lands or be indemnified for moneys expended; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. I hold in my hand a printed memorial or petition, but it is signed in the handwriting of the persons purporting to be petitioners, they being business men and residents of San Francisco, California, hat-makers, protesting against the further extension of the patent of Henry A. Wells for forming hat-bodies, stating that this patent has already been extended for seven years, and that a complete monopoly has been enjoyed for twenty-eight years. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY presented a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of an appropriation for the construction of a custom-house and post-office building at Kansas City, and the establishment of a district court thereat; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the enactment of a law granting to the residents on school lands in all the fractional townships numbered 67, in ranges 8 to 43 west of the principal meridian, the benefits of the act of May 20, 1825; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, asking an appropriation for the erection of a public building at Kansas City, to be used as a custom-house and post-office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY. I will state that the reason why there are two separate resolutions in regard to public buildings at Kansas City is because the respective resolutions were passed at different legislative sessions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented the petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying for an amendment to what is known as the "forest-culture law;" which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LEWIS. I present the memorial of Joseph Segar, of Virginia, asking compensation as Senator from that State. I desire that the memorial be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the memorial? The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the memorial; and having read for nearly ten minutes,

Mr. THURMAN. Is it proper to put a stop to the reading of that literature?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move that the further reading be suspended. The Chair called upon the Senate for objection, if any was to be made, but heard none.

Mr. THURMAN. I think we have had enough of it. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CONKLING. It is very hard that the right of petition should be treated in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Particularly as it is all he will get. We had better read it through.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that this petitioner comes from only just across the river, very near the District of Columbia; and if this petition is not to be read through I am afraid that truth and justice will lie bleeding in the streets.

Mr. THURMAN. I am very much afraid that that venerable humbug, called "the government of the Commonwealth of Virginia," that was set up by three or four hundred sutlers of the Army in Alexandria, will receive more respect than it deserves, and I give it more when I move to refer that thing to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to dispense with the further reading of this memorial, and to refer it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before that motion is put I should like to know who signs this memorial, and where it comes from?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are entitled to have it read to learn that.

The CHIEF CLERK. The petition is signed "Joseph Segar."

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Virginia who presented the memorial if this same gentleman, during a portion of the time for which he claims now to have been elected to the Senate, was not, in fact, a sitting member of the other House.

Mr. LEWIS. I will answer the Senator from Maine by saying that I do not know anything about it. That occurred at the time when I was shut off from the city of Washington, and could not get here, and could not know anything of what was transpiring here.

Mr. ANTHONY. Whatever may be done with this petition, I am sure it ought to be treated with respect. I do not desire that it should be read. This gentleman was elected a member of this body. He was elected to succeed a man who died here, and he was elected by precisely the same authority as his predecessor was who was admitted; and if Mr. Segar had no right to a seat, then the fault is somewhat in the Senate for admitting his predecessor to a seat upon precisely the same authority that Mr. Segar claimed his seat. So, although I have nothing to say at present as to the merits of the claim, I certainly think that this petitioner has a right to come here, and that his petition should be treated with respect by this body to which he was elected.

Mr. THURMAN. There is certainly no disrespect to his petition when I move to refer it to the proper committee. That is not treating it with disrespect. The only thing I am apprehensive of is that it is treating it with too much respect.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. I thought my friend from Ohio treated it with disrespect when he said, "I move to refer that thing to the Committee on Privileges and Elections."

Mr. CONKLING. And refused to hear it read, or have it printed, even.

Mr. ANTHONY. And I think it would be treating it with greater respect if we should refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, although I will not insist on that.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Rhode Island is a "thing," and I am a "thing," and we are all "things."

Mr. EDMUNDS. "To all men." [Laughter.]

Mr. BOREMAN. This gentleman, I have no doubt, has taken this method of getting his case before the Senate. He is a gentleman of the highest respectability, whom I have known for a quarter of a century. He was one of the few men in Virginia who stood by the Government when it needed friends. He has lost a fortune by his loyalty to the Government. He was elected here by a Legislature which had been recognized, and which continued to be recognized for several years after he was so elected. Governor Pierpoint had been aiding the Government of the United States by putting soldiers into the Army, by leading thousands and thousands—not a mere handful—of loyal men in West Virginia, at a time when their support was recognized and deemed of some importance to the Government. I think his claim is a valid one. It may do now, after all these transactions are passed, to laugh this thing down; it may do to cast odium on a few loyal men in Virginia who stood by the Government at that time. Their services are passed, and it seems that their services are forgotten; at least they are not appreciated.

Now, sir, I think that this gentleman ought to be heard, that his petition might be read here in this presence, inasmuch as he represented a government which was recognized and continued to be recognized; but that government is now denounced by the Senator from Ohio as a humbug. That may be satisfactory to him, but it is not a proper designation of this organization. This government was not made by a few sutlers or camp-followers of the Army. It was the government of the loyal, the true, men of Virginia. The camp-followers of the Army had nothing to do with it. The Army had nothing to do with this organization, except to protect it from the rebel army—as this Capitol was protected from the rebel army—and it would have been taken had it not been for the Army of the United States.

I do not think the petition of this gentleman who represented the loyal element in Virginia should be laughed out of this presence, but it ought to be treated respectfully. Whether his claim shall be regarded as a valid one or not it is not for me now to say. I have expressed my opinion, and I have said that I believed he was entitled to his seat; otherwise the Government here at Washington did a very irregular thing, to say the least of it, in recognizing that government and continuing to recognize it.

I have no objection to the reference of the petition, but I should like very much that it had been read through, to see what the gentleman had to say in vindication of his claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the further reading of this petition be dispensed with, and that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The question being put, it was decided in the negative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk continued, and concluded the reading of the memorial.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not belong to the Committee on the Judiciary. It belongs of right, according to the regulations of the Senate, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That is where it ought to go. The Committee on Privileges and Elections were constituted for the purpose of trying contested cases and determining the rights of people who claim to be Senators, and this is one of them.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no objection. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of George Görtt, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of Oliver Wyatt, president of the Five Cents Savings-Bank of Dover, New Hampshire, relative to the Floyd acceptances, issued by Majors Russell and Waddell; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that a pension be granted to Abner P. Phelps, for services rendered in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

No. 439) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for services in carrying the United States mails; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN. Accompanying the bill is a printed report which I made to the Senate last year in connection with the same bill, which the committee have readopted. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary C. He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Martin, asking to be placed on the pension-rolls, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

MILITARY RESERVATION AT SALT LAKE CITY.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes, to report it back with an amendment, and if there be no objection, I ask that the bill be considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It authorizes the Secretary of War to grant to Daniel S. Tuttle, Warren Hussey, George E. Whitney, Edmund Wilkes, and Abel W. White, and to their successors, a tract of land in the United States military reservation of Camp Douglas, near Salt Lake City, not exceeding twenty acres in extent, in such place as they shall select, (subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and not to be made so as to interfere with the use and occupation of the reservation for military purposes,) to be used as a public cemetery, under such rules and regulations as they shall establish for the protection, care, and management of the cemetery.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, This cemetery shall be open and free to all, without any other charge than what is necessary for care, protection, and embellishment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-STATION AT NAYATT POINT.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill to withhold from sale the site of the old light-station at Nayatt Point; and as I presume there will be no objection to it, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 438) to withhold from sale the site of the old light-station at Nayatt Point, was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose there were some reasons for passing the law ordering this site to be sold; and I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to explain why it is proposed to be suspended now?

Mr. BOUTWELL. In the appropriation bill for the present fiscal year the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to sell this site, there having been an appropriation for a new light at a different point. There are two reasons suggested for withholding this piece of land from sale at the present time. One is that it is in the vicinity of what is rather a fashionable watering-place, and property is said to be increasing rapidly in value. Another is that if sold at public auction it is apprehended by those who have purchased land in the vicinity as a summer resort, that it will be purchased for purposes that will be disagreeable to the neighborhood. Under those circumstances the committee thought it best to withhold it for the present, as no injury could come to the Treasury, and it may even be needed for public purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TELEGRAPH OPERATOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order of February 3, 1874, directing the Chair to appoint an operator in the Senate wing of the Capitol, provided for in the "Act in relation to the lines of telegraph connecting the Capitol with the various Departments of the Government," the Chair has appointed William L. Ives, of Seneca Falls, New York.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 443) to provide for the payment of legal services rendered by Edmund M. Randolph to the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

No. 445) to authorize the equitable settlement of the accounts of Enos Lowe, late receiver of public moneys at Council Bluffs, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) I ask leave to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, and I desire that it may be printed and laid upon the table; and at an early day next week I shall ask the Senate to take it up for the purpose of reference, and to indulge me in a few remarks in regard to the nature of the bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was given to introduce a bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

BREAKWATER AT DU LUTH.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate any information in the possession of the Department relative to the condition of the breakwater at Du Luth, Minnesota; and the opinion or estimates of the Engineer Bureau as to the amount necessary to be appropriated to repair it so as to render secure from damage by storms the elevator, docks, freight-houses, and tracks, &c.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENTS AT MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the other day when the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] called up Senate bill No. 87 to facilitate the execution of, and to protect, certain public works of improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River, upon my suggestion he withdrew his motion to take up the bill, in order that some amendments, that seemed to me and to others to be necessary, might be prepared. They have been prepared, and as the bill is of some consequence, as I am told, and as it was my opposition which caused it to be laid over the other day, I feel bound to ask the Senate to take it up now. It will occupy but a very short time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 87) "to facilitate the execution of, and to protect, certain public works of improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not necessary to read that part of the bill which is stricken out by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment reported by the committee only will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, which was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of War is directed to assume full control over the particular channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River in course of excavation or improvement by the Government of the United States, and he may establish such regulations respecting the use of, or passage through, such channel as he shall deem needful to fully protect the channel and to facilitate the excavation, improvement, and use thereof. Such regulations shall be promulgated by publication thereof for ten days consecutively in two daily papers published in New Orleans, Louisiana, and the same may in like manner be changed from time to time; and any person interfering with, or obstructing, or attempting to obstruct, the said improvements, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment for not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting after the words "United States," in the seventh line, these words: "so far as may be necessary to the carrying on and protection of such excavation and improvement, and until the same be completed," so as to limit the control of the Secretary of War to the carrying on and protection of the excavation and improvement.

Mr. MORTON. That is right.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire now to move the amendment of which I gave notice, to insert after the word "improvements," in line 16, the following words:

And any person who shall willfully or negligently strand or sink any boat or craft in said channel, or who shall willfully or negligently obstruct said channel, or cause any impediment, injury, filling up, or shoaling therein.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STOCKTON. I think this bill should be placed upon the Calendar and take its ordinary course, and I think these amendments ought to be printed, in order that Senators may have an opportunity of seeing them.

Mr. THURMAN. They are printed.

Mr. STOCKTON. Both amendments?

Mr. THURMAN. No; the one limiting the power of the Secretary is not.

Mr. STOCKTON. The Senator from Ohio explains that some of the amendments have been printed, but not the one limiting the power of the Secretary.

Now, Mr. President, there seems to be a disposition increasing every year for Congress to assume that the courts of this country are powerless, that they are unable to do that work which they were constituted to do, and which they have done for years in this country and England, in the preservation and protection of our public waters. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] would be a very proper amendment if it were necessary; but the subject is not only within the jurisdiction of the United States courts, but they are engaged in considering it every day. It is a part of their ordinary jurisdiction which has never been disputed or denied.

The bill as it comes here from the committee gives the jurisdiction of a channel of the Mississippi to the Secretary of War. I do not know that that has ever been done in reference to any large navigable channel of the public waters of this country. I do not know that it is necessary to do it. I see no particular reason for it.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] has offered an amendment which he seems to think it is unnecessary to print, but which, in my humble opinion, it is most important should be printed and examined before this bill is acted upon. He sees the necessity of limiting the power which is given to the Secretary of War by the act as now reported from the committee. He, as a lawyer, sees the difficulty in removing questions of nuisance or no nuisance from the courts of law and committing their adjudication to a military power.

We may be unadvised as to the truth of the facts, and may act greatly to the injury of those who have a common right with all the citizens of this country to navigate its rivers; and therefore he has proposed, acknowledging the novelty and difficulty of this proposition, this amendment, which, so far as it goes, undoubtedly is an improvement on the bill. He limits the power of the Secretary of War to such time and in such manner as may be necessary for the prosecution of this work; "so far as may be necessary" are the words used.

Now, if it be necessary in the performance of great public improvements for certain portions of that river to be within the control of the Secretary of War temporarily, and if it be true that the courts of the United States, in the exercise of their legitimate jurisdiction, are incapable of protecting that property without the direct interference of the military power; if it be necessary, in other words, that the Secretary of War shall be a great national chancellor to issue injunctions and enforce them himself in reference to the public navigable waters of this country, then it may be necessary to pass this bill. But I humbly submit that without even printing these amendments, without an opportunity afforded to read this bill as it has come from the committee, we should at least know what we are doing when so important a change is proposed to be made. This is a new and dangerous interference with the legitimate exercise of the jurisdiction of the United States courts in that which is one of their most important duties, and which certainly Senators from the West should not doubt that they have always been willing to exercise faithfully and fairly. The power cannot be confided anywhere so safely. There never has been any complaint that I know of that the courts have failed to exercise this jurisdiction whenever it was necessary.

Therefore, without detaining the Senate this morning on this subject, I think it is due to the Senators who have had no opportunity to examine this bill that they should have ample time. I see no reason why this bill should be taken up out of order, and why an effort should be made to pass it now. It is certainly much better that it should be placed on the Calendar, so that every Senator may have full opportunity to examine it.

If this is done in reference to the mouth of the Mississippi River it will not be long before this precedent will be followed elsewhere, and all the rivers and all the harbors of the United States will be placed under the charge of the Secretary of War under military supervision. Since I have been in this Senate a bill has been introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce, and certainly one, if not more, bills reported from the Committee on Commerce, the main feature of which was to give the protection and control of all the harbors in the United States to three military commissioners, and such measures have been advocated by Senators on this floor. The passage of such a bill has been petitioned for by citizens from the very ports over which the bills propose to exercise control.

Now, sir, can this be wise? Is there any lawyer in the Senate who does not know that the slightest encroachment upon the navigable waters of a stream is a public nuisance, that it can be abated by injunction, it can be abated by information of the Attorney-General, it can be abated on the complaint of any private individual who may be injured thereby, and that the courts of the United States are engaged daily in adjudicating such questions? No one will deny that.

The bill to which I refer proposed to give the Secretary of War power to issue an order, not only preventing the erection of any encroachment in a navigable stream or harbor, but an order ordering the individual therein commanded to remove any obstruction which might at any time previously have been placed there—a greater power than can be exercised by any other authority in this country, except that which was so wisely and safely committed to the courts of the United States in the exercise of their equity powers. Every lawyer in the Senate knows that such nuisances may be abated by common-law processes; every lawyer knows that they may be prevented by injunction; and yet this is to be put into the hands of three military commissioners without any reason assigned therefor.

Mr. President, a citizen who has acquired rights on a navigable stream by the ownership of the bank, who has acquired rights over that portion of the property which has been conceded to him by State laws as his right, connected with the ownership of the bank above, is liable in these courts for any injury he may do to the public navigation; but that citizen, if he does encroach upon a public stream under State law, under his natural common-law right, may benefit the navigation of the stream. An encroachment is not necessarily a nuisance. He may have a jury of his fellow-citizens willing and able to find that he had done great good to navigation instead of injury, and he is protected in the courts of his country by a jury of his peers, by the law of the land. But under such a bill he is liable to have his whole property taken from him by one order of three military commissioners, who may be actuated—for we may well presume it—either by ignorance, or misapprehension, or bad designs.

Mr. President, the proposition to take this large jurisdiction from the courts of law and confer it upon a military power is utterly unnecessary as well as unconstitutional, and one of the most insidious and dangerous advances that I have seen made since I have been in Congress; and I am therefore surprised that it should be supposed that this bill, without its amendments and safeguards even being submitted to us, can be allowed to pass through this body. I ask no more than time to examine it. I ask no more than to see if this system must be adopted; to see if it be true that the courts in this country have become powerless and useless, and if we must resort to the military power to protect us in our civil rights, and to preserve the great common right of navigation of our own navigable streams. If that be so, I ask at least that before the adoption of such a system we may examine such provisions with as much care as our intelligence and foresight will enable us to apply to them.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I scarcely think that it is exactly in accordance with the usual fairness of the Senator from New Jersey to ask for a further delay on the subject of this bill. If he will examine the printed copy that should be upon his desk, he will discover that the bill was introduced on the 8th of December, was reported back on the 22d of January, was recommitted on the 23d of January, was again reported to the Senate on the 30th of January, and notice was given by the Senator from Ohio, a day or two since, that he would call it up yesterday, and the Senator from New Jersey has had ample time to inform himself in regard to it. And although he has professed entire ignorance of the object of this bill to the Senate, yet it must be palpable to the Senate that he is extremely well informed on the subject generally, and it is his misfortune that he has not enabled himself to be as well informed in regard to this branch of it.

He has addressed himself to abuses which exist only in his imagination and have no connection with this bill at all. The Senate understands, and the Senator should understand, that this is a bill to enable the Secretary of War to promote a certain improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi; and to disabuse the Senator's prejudices in regard to it, I will ask him a question and make an illustration to him. There are three mouths, if I may so express it, to the Mississippi River, one of which is in process of excavation by the authority of the United States, and by the instrumentality of the United States. Now, should it be desirable to complete that work, would it not be competent for the Government of the United States to take possession of that mouth and leave the other two for the use of commerce? There is the illustration. The Mississippi has three mouths; the Government is operating upon one; and would it not be competent for the Government of the United States, authorized thereto by an act of Congress, to take possession, or for the Secretary of War by authority of the Government to take possession of that one channel? I ask the Senator that question.

Mr. STOCKTON. I will reply to the Senator when he has concluded.

Mr. WEST. Very well. This is a proposition that the Secretary of War, authorized thereto by this act, shall take possession of that one particular channel. He will take possession of it not to the absolute exclusion of commerce, but will permit at the same time, so far as it does not conflict with the operations of the Government, the transit of vessels for commercial purposes.

Then what is the power of the Secretary of War? Simply to make regulations as to the transit of vessels. Then what are the penalties for the transgression of those regulations? Those regulations are intended to be in good faith to the commercial community, that they may know what the Secretary of War desires them to do for the passage of their vessels; and if they willfully, negligently, or criminally transgress those regulations, then it is for the courts of the United States to hold them responsible for it. The Secretary of War has no further jurisdiction in the matter whatever. It is, it seems to me, one of the most harmless powers that you could confer in the connection of the utility of this very work, and I am sure if the Senator had studied it and had understood it, he would have no objection to it. I should be pleased to yield to his solicitations for further information—for further examination; but among the many obstacles that we have to encounter at the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi, among the very many that go to obstruct commerce, we have at last encountered the most serious one yet, and that is the division of opinion in this Senate as to what it is best to do in the premises. We have discussed this matter pro and con, and at last we have come to a conclusion that is satisfactory to every Senator who has examined the bill, and we are obstructed by one Senator who says he has not had time. I pray him to consider that this obstruction not only retards commere at the mouth of the Mississippi River, but it throws an embargo upon the entire grain crop of the West, and that is the obstruction we want to remove.

Mr. STOCKTON. The Senator from Louisiana, in his natural desire to have a bill passed which he thinks to the advantage of his State, has seen fit to say that he did not consider it fair for any objection to be made on account of want of time to examine this bill. But the Senator from Louisiana in making out that case stated the time the bill was introduced and various other stages of the bill, but he forgot to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, which I stated to the Senate when I rose, that the bill, under the two amendments from the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Ohio, is a very different bill and very much better guarded than it was when it came to the Senate.

He also omitted to notice that the position that I took was that if this thing must be done from public necessity it should be done with every possible safeguard; and it was only this morning that myself or any other Senator except those of the committee heard the amendments read. And it was admitted by the Senator from Ohio, as I stated, that the amendment which gives the control "so far as shall be necessary" has never been printed.

If after the bill was referred, if after this delay occurred, not by my action, not by any objection from me, such a lawyer as the Senator from Ohio reports that there should be added to this bill, which otherwise if not recommitted by an objection from some other Senator when it was up before would have passed without the amendment—when, I say, such an amendment is proposed to be added as "so far as may be necessary for this purpose," I think it is manifest that the delay that has occurred has been very important to the vital principles which I have attempted to show the Senate were involved in it.

The bill now, as reported from the committee, is better than the bill referred to them, undoubtedly; but that bill is now subject to all the objections I have made. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is an attempt to exclude a conclusion which is the apparent design of the body of the bill. It confines the power to an exercise "so far only as necessary," and while it is valuable as a safeguard, is more so as exhibiting the hesitation of Senators under any plea of necessity to admit the doctrines of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bankrupt bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order; but I am willing that my friend from Louisiana should have five minutes to finish his bill.

Mr. WEST. The Senator from Vermont having kindly yielded a few moments more of the Senator's time, I will ask that the bill that has been discussed recently be now put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce to Senate bill No. 87, as amended.

Mr. BAYARD. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the amendment recommended by the committee as amended in the Senate?

Mr. BAYARD. Upon the bill to take possession of the mouth of the Mississippi River?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I was not aware that question was before the Senate. Has the regular order been called for?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order was called for by the Senator from Vermont, but was waived in favor of the Senator from Louisiana, for five minutes, to dispose of the bill in regard to improvements at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think that a bill controlling such a question as I think this bill contains ought to be passed until the Senate shall understand distinctly the road they are walking in. If this bill has any precedent, it is unknown to me. When it was first brought in by the Senator from Louisiana who now urges its passage, it was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the entire bill was stricken out as he sent it there. It then was reported by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER.] Amendments were proposed to it by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] and his proposed amendments caused a recommittal of the bill. It then comes back with his amendment perhaps—I cannot say his amendment; I do not know; we have not before us what his amendment was—but it comes back very much amended and the power sought to be conferred upon the Secretary of War very considerably curtailed. But, nevertheless, the powers proposed to be conferred even by this amendment are such as I have no knowledge of any precedent for in the history of our legislation.

Mr. President, this continual absorption of jurisdiction by the executive branch of the Government is a thing that I look upon with great disfavor. Every power essential for the due execution of the laws I will at all times most cheerfully vote for, but I shall not vote to enlarge their jurisdiction, especially where the grant is at the cost of one of the most important and one of the weakest branches of our Government, to wit, the judiciary.

The bill is, in my opinion, entirely unnecessary. The grant of power would be superfluous were it not dangerous. I think it is both. If the Congress of the United States, having control of the commerce of the country, and through the commerce of the country of the harbors essential for the conduct of that commerce, has the power to make appropriations for the improvement, the alteration of any given harbor, there can be no doubt that while that improvement is in the course of prosecution the officers in charge have jurisdiction, in the nature of police jurisdiction, proper and necessary to enable them to conduct the work, upon the same principle that commissioners of your cities who undertake to improve a thoroughfare or change the grade of a street, or otherwise amend the plat of a city, have full power, during the period of that improvement, to shut off the street, to prevent its use as a thoroughfare, and control the use of the avenue, pro tempore, by the public. No one doubts that fact. We can see it illustrated every day of our lives that certain avenues are for the time being cut off from public use while the improvement or alteration is going on. Precisely so if the Secretary of War or his officer of engineers has charge of any harbor, has charge of any one of the several mouths of the Mississippi River for the purpose of dredging out the channel, for the purpose of facilitating the commerce in that section, he has the power during the period necessary to complete that improvement to take possession of the channel and to make the improvement in accordance with the intent of the appropriation.

To-day in New York there is a very important improvement going on in the attempt to excavate Hell Gate Channel to make it fit for the passage of ships, and enormous sums are being spent, which I hope will end in fruits of benefit to the whole country. Who can doubt that the officer of engineers in charge has a perfect right to do that which he does do—place his obstructions to navigation temporarily where they will finally result in clearing the channel? Who can doubt that to-morrow the Secretary of War, or the officer of engineers who may be detailed for that purpose, taking possession of this portion of the Mississippi River, can station there his steam-dredges, his flat-boats, or any of those other parts of machinery necessary for the purpose of completing this improvement—station them where he pleases, and forbid any interference by passing vessels? No one doubts that fact, because the power to do so is essential to the completion of the improvement; but why proceed to give him, by act of Congress, full control over this particular channel, and allow him to establish regulations by law for its use, and to promulgate those regulations for ten days, consecutively, in two daily papers—in other words, establishing a fixed jurisdiction which shall not be controlled by the rights of citizens, which cannot be taken from them or impaired by the passage of this act of Congress? Then follows a penal enactment for any person obstructing any of the improvements, or attempting to obstruct them.

Already, Mr. President, the courts of the United States have ample jurisdiction. There is full machinery to prevent any interference with the contemplated improvement of that river, and I say it is a serious question for Congress to contemplate the delivery by means of an act of Congress of any channel of any river wholly to the control of the Secretary of War. He has the implied control already when we pass the appropriation and assume the right to expend it in the manner indicated. That is all he wants, and that is all he should have. I object to this constant grant of powers to an executive officer when plenary powers are not only furnished to him in courts of law, but furnished him by implication in the grant of the money for the purpose of carrying out the improvement.

I know very well how one step leads to another; I know very well how one precedent established is made the stepping-stone for a still longer stride. The question of the control of the harbors of this country is a very delicate and a very important one. The lines of States meet closely upon the great rivers. The harbors that lie on either side of those rivers are subject to the mixed jurisdiction of the two States; and if it can be found that we may thus hand over to the Secretary of War exclusive jurisdiction of any harbor under the pretext of improving it, then we may sometimes find the right of control by a State ousted under the same pretext and by the same machinery.

The harbor of the great city of New York is one that might afford a very strong illustration of what I now mean. No man can visit that harbor, so important as it is to the commerce of this country and of a great portion of the world, without being driven to the belief and conviction that the best harbor at that port is on the New Jersey side of the river. I think part of the difficulty which the committee that sat in New York two years ago saw, as causing the trouble which in part we were intended by our investigation to rectify, was the intent by means of the machinery of the collection of customs at the city of New York to overcome the natural advantages which the State of New Jersey and her coast derived at that port; and for that reason there was favoritism employed to counterbalance in favor of the city of New York and persons residing there the advantages which nature had bestowed upon the State of New Jersey and her coast.

I submit to the Senate, and to all Senators who are interested in defining and preserving the lines of State jurisdiction, that it is proper for them to look closely, to look carefully at any precedent which shall seek to give one of the executive officers of the Government, as the Secretary of War, the right to have exclusive control and jurisdiction, and in his case that means, of course, military control and jurisdiction over the harbors of any State in this country. They may find, and, I think, they will find, that there will be the attempt by this means of indirection to oust the local control from its proper exercise. I, for one, stand always jealous of the accretion of executive power in this manner.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I do not attach to the bill as it now stands the importance that has been given to it by the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from New Jersey. I concur with both those distinguished Senators as to the principle advanced by them, that we should not give control of the harbors of the United States to the War Department. This bill, I think, does not do that. The object is to give the War Department the control for the time being of that channel in which the Government, under the direction of the War Department, is now doing a certain work, and nothing more. There are many channels, many outlets of the Mississippi River. The intention of this bill is to give to the Secretary of War control of "the particular channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River in course of excavation or improvement by the Government of the United States," and it is confined to that channel alone.

The great difficulty at the mouth of the Mississippi River, about which so much has been said, throughout the western country particularly, is to be found as much in the mode of doing business there as in the fact that there is a want of depth of water at the mouth of the river. The great trouble there has been, and the great trouble is now, and of this I speak within my own knowledge, that a monopoly has for many years existed in New Orleans, called the Tow-Boat Association, which has been so strong and so powerful that all the efforts of the business men of New Orleans up to this day have not been able to break it down. It is a fact beyond doubt that many of the vessels coming in or going out of the Mississippi River are run aground purposely by this association for the purpose of making money by extricating them from their condition.

The effect of this bill, the scope of it, is to confine this control given to the Secretary of War to that particular channel alone, and no other. It simply means that while this work is being done the Government shall not be interfered with. If it is interfered with, the work cannot be well done. Now if you give the control to the Government you have to give it to a certain department of the Government. The War Department, through the Bureau of Engineers, has control of this work, and where work of this sort is being done in any of the harbors of the United States, in the East or in the West, it is always exclusively, as a matter of necessity, under the control of the War Department. While it is being done, it is proper and right that that Department doing the work should have the power to protect that work while it is being done. I can see no other meaning to this bill. I think it is needed by the city of New Orleans, and I presume the business men of New Orleans, without any exception, would favor this measure. I happened to be in New Orleans last spring, and this subject—not particularly this one subject, but the subject of the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River—was one of daily discussion, and the mode of carrying on the work then being done by the Government was of daily discussion.

I would agree with the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Delaware, if an attempt was made to control any of the harbors on the sea-board or in the interior, through the War Department or any of the Departments; but that is not the object of this bill, nor do I believe the language of the bill will sustain that construction. It reads:

> That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of War is directed to assume full control over the particular channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River in course of excavation or improvement—

It must be known to Senators that there are many channels there, and perhaps one is as good as the other, but they are at work upon one channel. The bill speaks of this particular channel—in course of excavation or improvement by the Government of the United States, and he may establish such regulations respecting the use of, or passage through, such channel as he shall deem needful, &c.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will allow me, he omits the limitation which has just been put in there by an amendment, which has been adopted, to insert after the words "United States," in the seventh line, these words:

So far as may be necessary to the carrying on and protection of such excavation and improvement, and until the same be completed.

Limiting the power of the Secretary. That is an amendment adopted this morning.

Mr. BOGY. Offered by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; the amendment that I offered.

Mr. BOGY. I had not seen that. The amendment of my friend from Ohio only makes that more perfect which was perfect before.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from New Jersey misapprehend the scope of this bill. I look upon this bill as a necessary measure, without which the commerce of New Orleans will greatly suffer. While this work is being done, it strikes me it is almost a necessity that the War Department should have full control of that channel. I see no objection to it, and I concur with the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, when the desultory remarks that I was making were stopped by the expiration of the morning hour I was just about replying to a question asked me by the Senator from Louisiana. I did not reply to him when he asked the question simply because I did not wish to interrupt the remarks which he was then making by too lengthy a reply, and I found it could not be made in one sentence. The Senator from Delaware, however, since the matter has again come up, has really given the answer which I intended to give. The Senator from Louisiana, stating that there were three mouths of the Mississippi River, asked me if I understood that the Secretary of War could not take possession of one.

The answer to his question is this: Under the power given to the Secretary of War to make any improvement designated in the act authorizing such improvement to be made, he has the incidental power to take such possession and to make such stoppage of navigation as may be necessary to do the work that Congress has intrusted to him; but when the Secretary of War, in the exercise of that discretionary power, which he is acting under only as an executive officer, exceeds the limits and bounds of the power given him by the law, the work can be stopped and the navigation can be opened by the courts of the United States upon an appeal to them. The power is limited. It is for a specific purpose. It is given in the bill which authorizes the work to be done. It needs no addition; it needs no amendment. Addition or amendment to the specific power given to him, particularly after this specific clause introduced by the Senator from Ohio, is a power for which there is no precedent whatever. In one word, the order to do the work given by Congress conveys the necessary authority to do that work, and it needs no other power; and that is the reply that I make to my distinguished friend from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY.]

Certainly neither he nor any Senator from the West or South can feel more interest than I do, not only in the preservation of the great public channels of our country, but in their improvement; and I have been found ever since I have been a member of this body an advocate for such proper appropriations as may seem necessary yearly, not only to keep open, but to improve, the navigation of our western and southern streams quite as much as of those of my own immediate neighborhood. But I cannot forget that the right of ferry, the right of fishing, and the right of bathing, are rights that the courts of my own State as well as the courts of the United States have adjudged to be held by as firm a tenure by a citizen who owns the bank along the shore as any man can hold a tenure to his farm. It is just as sacred, and is precisely the same tenure, a tenure subject to the public good and the public navigation, just as a man by the title to his house holds to the middle of the street, but holds it subject to the public right of use.

Now, sir, if my view of this bill, that it is a dangerous innovation, an attempt which will soon be followed by propositions more evidently dangerous, should be true, can any Western Senator, can any Senator from any part of this country, fail to see that it would be unwise for him to act hastily and without proper consideration upon this bill?

It would be wrong for me to detain the Senate by referring to the reports which give the history of this matter in the West. Suffice it that the courts have always been competent to preserve and protect these channels of communication. The Wheeling Bridge case, the bridge case which has been since argued in the Senate by the Senator from Ohio and other Senators from the West in reference to bridging the Mississippi River, all come to us and tell us but one story on this subject, and that story is, that the Constitution of the United States and the body of the system of our laws have made the courts the guardians of this great public right—a right quite as sacred as that which the man who owns the land has to the shore—the right of every individual to navigate freely and without hinderance the waters of this country; and they have committed that right to the courts of this country. When a railroad company, under the pretense of public good, attempts to violate the great right of navigation, where do you go? If the proposition was, in order that there might be ready access from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic, that the great navigable waters of this country should be so obstructed by railway bridges that they should be a serious impediment in the navigation of the Ohio or the Mississippi River, where would you go for help? Did you ever go to the courts of the United States and they failed to help you?

True, lines had been drawn between two great rights of transit, so as to prevent a conflict of law between two authorities to transfer passengers and freight on public lines of communication by common carriers, one by water and one by land; true the conflict of laws on this question has gone through every State court and every United States court; true it has settled down and is settling down, as all such questions do, by our beautiful system of law, which adapts itself to the changes of the community, and to the invention of modern science and new methods of transit, until the courts, by the application of those same principles which they administered long before the invention of steam, have said that both these methods of transit shall be fairly considered, that the steam locomotive shall not impede the navigation of the great rivers, and the navigation of the great rivers shall not be so conducted that passengers shall be obliged to pass around them, and rivers remain permanent insurmountable barriers. I mention this to call attention of the lawyers in the Senate, and those gentlemen who represent States which have such great interest in this subject, to the fact that the first step to give the control of any of the harbors or navigable waters of the United States to a military commission is to destroy one of the most sacred and one of the most valuable practical rights that belong to the citizens of this country.

I have a right to paddle my canoe in any mouth of the Mississippi River without any let or hinderance from the Secretary of War. And when—to refer to the simile of the Senator from Delaware—the necessities of repairing that stream shall require, under an act of Congress, an appropriation from Congress, an agent of the Government, be he an overseer of the highway or engineer of the United States Army, to temporarily obstruct that stream, the power goes with it and needs no addition whatever. This bill must have some other purpose or it is very unskillfully drawn.

Now, Mr. President, look at the river and harbor bills that come here every year. What difference is there, let me ask Senators, between the appropriation of six, eight, and ten millions and its proper distribution in those parts of the Union where it seems most necessary under the War Department and by the engineer appointed for that purpose, and this case? Is there anything in the mouth of the Mississippi River that withdraws it from the law that controls the appropriations elsewhere? Is there any reason why the proper protection of the work in hand—which the engineers of the Army have never failed to exercise—should not be there and then present in this work going on in the Mississippi River? The Senator from Delaware well said this act is a work of superfluity, as well as a dangerous and insidious way to take from the courts a power that is quite as important to the Senators from the South and West as it is to those who come from the Atlantic States and reside in the neighborhood of large and important harbors and commercial ports—valuable, as I said, individually—and a sacred right of the citizen that can be interfered with in no way but by the courts of law. It is valuable to the United States to preserve it in the channel in which it is.

Mr. BOGY. Allow me to ask the Senator what power exists in the courts if a person be guilty of the obstruction of any channel? By this bill he is guilty of a misdemeanor, and must be convicted in court. What power would the court have without the bill?

Mr. STOCKTON. The power given by the amendment to which I presume the Senator alludes, making encroachments misdemeanors, is simply re-enacting what has existed from the earliest history of the common law, and what exists in every State of this Union to-day. Any man, any corporation, any power that obstructs or encroaches on a navigable stream creates a purpresture, and is liable to be indicted, and is daily indicted in our courts of justice now. So far as that clause is concerned, if it has no practical meaning and no practical effect except the one alluded to, it is mere surplusage. But the bill itself purports to give control to the Secretary of War without leaving any appeal to a jury, without submitting the question of nuisance or no nuisance, encroachment or no encroachment, to the peers of the man who may be charged with doing this thing, and in that respect it is the exercise of an arbitrary and unconstitutional power, which never has been justifiable except as a police and temporary regulation, as sanitary laws and the exercise of municipal regulations, which are necessary to the public good and safety, and which receive their sanction only on account of their necessity, and because the people who are locally called to obey them are the people who daily and hourly have within their midst and around them opportunities by their votes and in the other ways of amending them.

Mr. President, I disclaim any intention of the slightest desire in the world to obstruct in any way the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River. I disclaim any intention whatever to do anything but forward the improvement of the navigation of all our rivers and harbors. But I do not think it is wise, I do not think it is any more necessary, as I said, there than in the case of any other river or harbor improvement, to carry out every other appropriation which is made, to have a specific law giving specific powers to the Secretary of War on this subject, and I doubt not that the courts of Louisiana, if this bill is not passed, will see that in the exercise of the proper discretion, the execution of the proper work there, the Secretary of War is not hampered or interfered with by any private interest or by any power whatever. There really can be no collision. The interest of all those who live in the neighborhood would be the other way—to have this work done.

But, sir, my real objection, as I said in opening, is simply and solely that I see in it the most dangerous precedent which has been presented to the Senate for years, and one which is not now proposed for the first time, but has been attempted in this body several times during several years past.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, the question I presume is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that that amendment has already been agreed to; and the question now is, will the Senate agree to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce as amended?

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 36, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Clayton, Conkling, Crozier, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cooper, Fenton, Johnston, McCreery, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Stockton—9.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1761) granting certain swamp lands in Holt County, Missouri, to the said Holt County, for school purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies.

DISTRICT-GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to be excused from serving on the joint committee of investigation in relation to the affairs of the District of Columbia, and I make that request of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey having been appointed on the joint select committee authorized by the resolution passed this morning, asks to be excused. Will the Senate excuse him?

Mr. SHERMAN. As some one has got to perform this laborious and very unpleasant duty, I hope the Senator will not press his resignation. As a matter of course, if he insists upon it for a good reason I will not oppose excusing him. I think it is important for the public interests, for the quiet of the community here, and for the general interests of the people of the United States, that this investigation should be as searching, as severe, and as thorough as possible, so as to settle the controverted matters about the District. I hope, therefore, the Senator will perform this duty.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, appreciating fully the kindness of the Senator from Ohio, I suggest, inasmuch as he did not serve on one of these investigating committees at the last session and I did, and as he can perform the duty much better than I can, I should be very happy to vote for him to take my place.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am quite sure that as the wise decision of the Chair selected the Senator from New Jersey as a member of this committee, the Senate ought to stand by that decision and not overrule it. It seems to me that for the performance of this important and laborious duty the committee has been very well constituted and will give great satisfaction. I hope, therefore, the Senator from New Jersey will not be excused, unless he can give some specific reason which disables him from performing the duty.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the Senator from New Jersey ought to be excused. He has been on two or three committees of this kind within the last two sessions, and he is now a member of four standing committees. I know that it would be to the interest of the country to have the Senator upon this committee, and everybody in the Senate would be glad to have him upon it; but we have never refused to excuse a member of this body from serving on any particular committee at his request, and I trust we shall not break through our good old rule now.

Mr. WRIGHT. I certainly should be quite unwilling to interpose any objection to any wish the Senator from New Jersey might express here, or to deny him anything he might want. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggests that we have never declined excusing Senators when they have asked to be excused from this service. I remember that at the last session of the Senate there were three Senators who asked to be excused from the investigation that was entered upon in connection with the Credit Mobilier—the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON]—and the Senate declined to excuse any of them. Now, if there be any reason personal to the Senator, any reason that he can suggest here aside from the work that is upon his hands in common with all of us, I shall certainly be inclined to excuse him. But aside from something of that kind, if the reason exists only in the fact that he has work upon his hands as a member of other committees, I see no more reason for excusing my good friend than any other member of this body.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am a member of four standing committees of the Senate. I discharged duty on one investigating committee at the last session; a very unpleasant duty. There are many Senators who are not upon four committees, and who did not discharge that duty at the last session; and there is another reason which I think has some weight. I myself am a tax-payer in this District, and I think it would be much better if the committee were formed of those who do not hold that relation to the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Almost everybody, I suppose, is a tax-payer in this District, whether high or low; but the Senator from New Jersey, as we know, has served upon several special committees within two or three of the last past sessions, and faithfully and long, where matters of delicacy and difficulty had occurred, and has discharged his full share of that kind of duty for the present, as I really believe; and therefore I think, as the Senator from New Jersey is perfectly earnest and sincere in saying that he is being overloaded with this special kind of business, it is but fairness to him that he should be allowed to retire from this committee, and have the Chair appoint somebody else. If my friend had not served so well and done so much already, there would be no reason, in my opinion, why another selection should be made, because of course a better one could not be made; but I think, consulting his wishes, he has a right to say that he has done as much in this kind of labor as he ought to be called upon to perform at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from New Jersey?

The question being put, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN was excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In consequence of the vacancy occasioned on the joint select committee on the affairs of this District by the Senate excusing the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] the Chair will appoint the Senator from New York, Mr. CONKLING.

Mr. CONKLING subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago the Chair announced my name as among those to constitute the committee of investigation. I know that the Chair did that in kindness, although had he conferred with me about it I should have been compelled to assign reasons to him which would have prevented such an announcement. I am going to ask to be excused. I do not do it because I am already a member of four committees, or of five committees, as I am, nor because I am very much occupied; nor wholly (although I think that reason would be sufficient) because I have been assigned already an attitude touching this matter which looks like some partiality on my part toward those who are to be investigated. I say I think that reason would have weighed with the Chair to decide against selecting me, and would weigh with the Senate in behalf of my request to be excused, because this investigation ought to be not only thorough, ought to be not only prompt and impartial, but it should be conducted by those as to whom no fact is supposed to exist which would impair the value of the report they might make or the judgment they might pronounce. But, in addition to that, for occasion of very recent origin, I am obliged to go away at once, to be gone how long I cannot precisely foresee, and I ask the Senate to excuse me from serving on that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks to be excused from serving on the joint select committee.

The question being put, Mr. CONKLING was excused.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1761) granting certain swamp lands in Holt County, Missouri, to the said Holt County, for school purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 1762) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend the act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1837, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in section 7 of the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, to insert before the fortieth line of that section the words, "being indebted over $3,000."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe I stated yesterday that the committee had considered this subject, and looking at all parts of the bill, including the provision which protects the small trader from being forced into bankruptcy without the assent of a quarter of his creditors holding a third of the amount of his debts, and the fact that this amendment leaves him out in the cold, entirely subject to State laws—to attachment laws in some States, to insolvent laws in others, to suits in the circuit courts of the United States by foreign creditors—could not consent to such an amendment as this. It exposes him entirely, with no protection at all except that of going voluntarily into bankruptcy. The policy of this bill is not to force anybody into bankruptcy who can get along; and to leave to these small traders the poor consolation of committing suicide instead of being destroyed by their creditors under the State laws appeared to us entirely unwise.

The protection as the bill now stands as we have reported it, that the small trader has is in the fact, in the first place, that he has his forty days, during which time nobody can sue him successfully so as to get any advantage, and the motive therefore for a private suit is withdrawn. The creditor can have no motive to undertake within that time to sue him, because he cannot get his pay in that time, and the thing would fall if the man was really to be driven out of his business. The policy of the law is to support the small traders as well as the large ones, and to enable them to go through without failure if they can; and therefore it gives a reasonable length of time. And then it provides that they still shall not be deemed bankrupts unless a third in amount and a fourth in number of their creditors shall petition to that effect; and even when they do, before a hearing shall come on if the debtor is able to pay up the paper in respect to which the complaint is made, the proceeding stops. What could be more wholesome or beneficial to both, I put it to my friend from Ohio, than that? What could be more just toward the creditors than that if you stand upon the principle this whole law does, that when a man cannot pay there shall be equality of division among all those who are interested in the estate, as in the case of debt? That is the way the bill leaves it.

Now, why take the small debtor out from the protection of this law, and expose him to the temptation of making fraudulent preferences, of making secret and collusive dispositions of his property, of collecting his assets by himself, and at the same time exposing this debtor thus tempted to the oppression of creditors in other States, who are not bound by his State laws in collecting their commercial debts? They are bound by general laws only, and can sue in courts that are not guided by the State laws at all, because the courts of the United States in respect to commercial transactions are not guided by the law of the State, as we all understand. Now I do submit (and submit very briefly, because I do not wish to extend the time of this discussion,) to my honorable friend from Ohio, that he destroys the equipoise that we have undertaken to make between the creditor on one side and the debtor on the other, and to destroy the value of the law to the whole community in continuing men in trade, in preventing failures and breakings up, and in encouraging industry, and to relieve against the effects of panics which will come. I say to him and to the Senate that in my opinion it will be a sad mistake to take out from the operation of this act, thus beneficial upon both sides, the largest class in fact of the whole traders of the country.

As I said the other day, it was tried in the act of 1800, and was again repeated in the act of 1841 only with a difference as to amount. The act of 1800 made it $1,000, I believe. The act of 1841, my friend from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] says, made it $2,000; I had forgotten the sum there fixed. I think Senators will find, if they look at the history of the proceedings under those acts, that if their repeal can be attributed to anything except the change of parties, one of the reasons was the imperfect working of those laws, growing out of the fact that they did not operate equally upon the whole body of traders in the community; that they made an arbitrary distinction, putting the man of $5,000 under one protection of one law and leaving the man of $3,000 or $2,000 under no protection at all, because the act of 1800 was entirely compulsory; there was no voluntary part about it; and the act of 1841 left him to the temptations which I have described, and whose only consolation would be in going into voluntary bankruptcy, which would still be provided for by this bill, it is true; that in order to be discharged and begin the world anew he must be able to pay 33 per cent.

I submit to the gentlemen who are proposing these amendments, that the committee have carefully considered all these countervailing considerations. Of course there is force in any one point of view that may be taken about it; but you must look at all; and we have endeavored to so adjust the relation between the debtor and the creditor as to secure the fairest justice, and the fairest humanity, and the best consideration for the State in preserving men from being broken up, and in enabling them to go on, if it is possible that they can, that we could devise. Now, to break a hole in any one part of the system is like taking the keystone out of an arch; you disturb the relations of all the rest. I hope it will not be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not prolong this argument by repeating anything that I said yesterday; but I wish to assure my honorable friend from Vermont that instead of taking out any stone in his arch, this amendment, in my judgment, will strengthen the bill and make it much more popular, and will satisfy those who have been clamoring for a repeal of the present law.

My own opinion was expressed yesterday, and I shall not repeat it, and more reflection has convinced me that I am right in regard to this limitation as to the small traders of the country, and my opinion is very greatly fortified by a statement made to me by a very eminent citizen who has had a great deal of experience in the execution of this law, and who says that this provision is not only a practicable one, but a very wise one, and would be of infinite service in the execution of the law.

All I rose for was to ask the Senate to give me the yeas and nays on this vote. I do not desire to propose any amendment to the bill in other respects. I have looked over the amendments of the committee and I approve of them heartily except as to this particular clause, which is one affecting a great mass of people. I should like to have the yeas and nays on this amendment, and a vote on the other amendment I have indicated in regard to the time, and then I shall be satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) On the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the seventh section of the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am endeavoring to follow the chairman of the committee and what stands before the Senate as the action of the committee, as far as I can, although I am not as well satisfied as my friend from Vermont that the amendments proposed by the committee will do away substantially with the very great inconveniences and great oppressions that attend the bankrupt law. As the yeas and nays are demanded upon this amendment, and as I shall vote for it, I venture to suggest to the Senator having the bill in charge that it is a mistake to resist this amendment. It does not to my comprehension unbalance what he calls the equipoise of the Senate committee's proposition at all. On the contrary, it is an alleviation, and it does withdraw from the remote and expensive administration of the Federal courts small cases, and withdraws them as I think advantageously, despite a consideration which the Senator from Vermont has so very frequently urged upon us that I have felt provoked upon other amendments to reply to it. I refer to that which he so continually suggests as the disadvantages, as the hardships, as the evils of proceedings in the State courts by which creditors sue their debtors. I did not agree to that suggestion the first time he mentioned it; I do not agree to it now, and I do not think it answers this amendment at all. If we are to preserve any part of the bankrupt law, it seems to me that we had better give up a little of that which in our estimation as individuals it might be safe to retain. Here is a thing which does relieve us, and I think does promote the chances of retaining what the Senator from Vermont believes to be much more important than he can possibly believe this provision to be one way or the other. Therefore I shall vote for it, and also because I think it is right in itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot let the remarks of my friend from New York go without a single word of reply. I have no doubt, of course, of the belief of my friend that this amendment is right. I am only sorry that the committee should not have felt able to see that it was right before. If it is right, of course we are very desirous of having it adopted; and I need not tell my friend how many days we all spent over this general subject in all its aspects. I need not tell my friend how much time was spent in considering every suggestion that debtor or creditor made in hundreds of letters sent to one and all of us touching the amendments that ought to be made to this bankrupt bill. I need not tell my friend that according to the best of my recollection not a single letter of any complaining man of the hundreds we have had on all parts of the subject has complained of the fact which this amendment of the Senator from Ohio is designed to change.

I have stated, and I believe truly, that no single letter, or petition, or any other thing, from the Law Association, as it is called, in the city of New York, or anybody else, has undertaken to complain of the fact that the minimum sum of $250 now is too low. Complaint of course has been made from all this mass of people of the fact, as they assert it, that the expenses eat up the estates. That of course would apply to small estates as well as great ones, and more to small than to great, and in that sense my friend may say that complaint has been made about this thing. But, Mr. President, what will you find when you turn to the report from the Attorney-General on the subject of the expenses under the bankrupt law as it now stands, not with our amendments? That report is well worthy of the attention of gentlemen who have thought that the expenses under the bankrupt law were so prodigiously excessive and exorbitant. I have no doubt that in some cases they have been. It is everywhere; it is so in the court nearest to us; it is so in the court on the next floor of this Capitol; it is so in the court at the city-hall in this city; it is so in the city of New York, and everywhere else. That is perfectly true; but how is it in bankruptcy? According to the report of the Attorney-General, made to us under a resolution of the Senate of the 24th of February last, I find from the statistics returned to him from the various districts of the United States, which are not complete, it is true, but which of course, as far as they go, would show the average cases that there had been during the whole period of the bankrupt system down to the 31st of December, 1872, (and since then he is not able to make up a table from the imperfection of the returns when he set out last spring,) 58,618 cases, and the total expenses of these 58,618 cases were $4,821,784.40, which is $80.20 to a case. Now, let any gentleman in this body, who practices law in his own State courts, get up and tell the Senate and the public what, in his opinion, is the average expense of the causes tried in the courts of superior jurisdiction where the whole of a man's property is at stake, as it is in bankruptcy, and where the rights of creditors, as between themselves and against the debtor, are always involved, whether it is done under the form of an action at law, or under the form of a proceeding against an insolvent debtor, or under the form of a creditor's bill. Can any man here say that in his State the law expenses of disposing of the property of a poor debtor, one who goes into a state of failure, have been as low on an average within the period of the last ten years as $80.20 or $180.20?

Take the case that my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] suggests to me, of the estates of deceased persons wound up by laws almost perfectly similar in every State of the Union, where there is equality among creditors, and where of course the smallest estate, if there is any property at all, not limited to $250, goes through the operation of judicial determination in respect to it, to provide first for the payment of the debts, and then for the distribution of the property to the people entitled to receive it, under the statutes of distribution or under a will, as it may be, and compare them; and I appeal to every lawyer who hears me, to every business man who has been connected with the disposition of estates, to say if he does not think that this statement of these aggregates in bankruptcy will bear a favorable comparison with the operations of the probate courts of the various States.

Now, the fact in a large degree from whence this great complaint has come, has been that a large number of the people who go into bankruptcy here as well as in Great Britain are men who have almost no assets at all, and therefore the estate is eaten up in bankruptcy, and almost every one of those cases, ninety-nine in one hundred of them, are cases of voluntary bankruptcy, which you propose to leave as they stand now.

Are we to be told then, Mr. President, that the substance of this proposition of my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is to protect small traders from having their estates eaten up in bankruptcy, which will do no good to anybody? Why, sir, do not forget that this is under the compulsory clause; and therefore if we are acting for the interest of the small trader in respect to eating up his estate when no dividend is to be paid, we have provided in the bill that if he is eaten up in costs, when his creditors attack him, he shall be deemed, if honest, just as much entitled to a discharge as if he had paid 50 per cent. or 100 per cent.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to ask my friend from Vermont whether the estimate of the expense of administering bankrupts' estates, which he has just read from the pamphlet in his hand, includes attorneys' fees, or simply the fees of the assignee, the register, the marshal, and the clerk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It includes the fees and expenses of assignee, clerks, marshals, and registers; every one of the officers. Therefore it includes all the money that the assignee has paid out for counsel fees, and which he charges in his account against the estate.

Mr. PRATT. Is it not notorious, however, that the fees of the attorneys absorb the larger portion of the assets of the bankrupt, practically, notwithstanding the law forbids it? Do not such fees practically come out of the assets of the bankrupt?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not quite comprehend my friend, or else he does not comprehend me. Here is the official return. It may be, as is said about the Louisiana credentials, all a forgery. I do not know; I have not gone through the Attorney-General's office to see whether the returns are forged or true. I only point out to my friend that the official returns, made under an order of this body passed last February, from the districts of the United States, although they are imperfect, as not coming from all the districts—some had not been got in; but from all that we have, which cover three-fourths or perhaps nine-tenths of all the districts—show this result: that the assignee has been obliged to report not only his own emoluments, but the expenses out of the estate that he has paid properly chargeable as expenses as well as emoluments, all the sums that he has expended; and so it is stated in the table, that it is not only the fee of the assignee, but it is the expense that he has incurred chargeable to the estate. My friend asks me if it is not notorious that in bankrupt estates large sums are absorbed by attorneys. I am very much afraid that that is true; and still, consistently with this, I do not know anything that happens among men, where there is a dispute, where a large sum is not absorbed by an attorney. I know that my honorable friends who are all around me just now, from the West and from the East, and from the Middle States, and from the great commercial capital of our country, do not disturb themselves in settling men's affairs unless they are paid for it; and they are paid for it, as they ought to be, according to the value of their time, which depends upon the eminence which they have attained in the practice and pursuit of their profession. It depends in fact upon the weight they carry in the battle they are to fight, and to win if they can, how much they are entitled to have. Therefore it is exactly with an assignee as it is with a sick man: if he employs an expensive attorney, (and, if it is a matter of any great consequence, if he does not he makes a great mistake, because ordinarily he will not get a good one,) he has to pay him, and it comes out of the estate. If he employs a cheap attorney, he pays him a cheap price, and generally gets beaten and somebody else gets the money. If the sick man employs a cheap doctor, who has not, by talent and study and experience and will through long years, become the master of that most difficult of sciences, he pays a high price. That is the commodity; intellect, will, skill, tact, learning, like every other commodity, commands the value that it possesses. If my honorable friend from New York has those qualities in a larger degree than other men in his State, as I am gratified to say we all know he has, it is right, if he is employed in a bankrupt case, that he should be paid what that which he contributes is worth. Very well, sir; what are you to do then? You have a bankrupt estate like that of Jay Cooke & Co., in Philadelphia, where the interests of millions are at stake, and where some collisions between classes of creditors which involve millions are at stake.

My honorable friend from New York is employed, or my honorable friend from Ohio. Is it any objection to the law or to them that a large sum is paid for their service because a large value is received in the service that they give? Not at all. Therefore, Mr. President, we argue upon insufficient foundations if we say that in bankrupt proceedings large sums are absorbed, as my friend from Indiana puts it, by attorneys. But when you take the whole average, we find that, attorneys and all, according to this official report, throughout the whole United States, and in almost sixty thousand cases—registers, clerks, everything made up into a total—the expenses amount to less than $100 a cause.

I am not defending the present fee-bill. I am not defending the exorbitant charges that in this district or that may have been made. I beg not to be misunderstood about that. We have cut them down, as my friend from Ohio suggests, one-half already, and we have provided that the judges of the Supreme Court should reinvestigate the whole subject under the authority they possess, and rectify any wrong that may exist. And we propose to provide that all these people shall separately make reports under oath to the clerks of the courts, which shall be forwarded to the Attorney-General every year, in order that he, charged with the execution of the duties of the Department of Justice, may see, and that Congress may see, how the administration of this law is going on.

Now, I submit, Mr. President, that this does answer the suggestion made by my friend from New York, that taking this class of people out of the operation of the bankrupt bill leaves them to what he says I have so often repeated, but like other great truths I think it cannot be too often repeated—you turn them over to a state of chaos where their creditors reside in different States and where they have a right to apply to different jurisdictions for redress. You do turn them over to a state of chaos, and instead of holding them up for forty days or for a longer period, as the case may be, under this bill, you leave them at the instant disposition of men who may be their creditors in every State, and to all the temptations against which every day we ought to pray "Lead us not into temptation"—all the sad temptations of favoring one creditor at the expense of another, or of concealing and making away with his estate altogether. There is where you leave him.

Mr. President, while I am on this subject of the comparative expense of turning a man over to the State laws, I wish to call the attention of the Senate particularly to a matter that I believe I referred to yesterday. I have before me one single sheriff's bill in the city of New York in the disposition of an estate on a judgment and execution that he had levied, and it is a specimen of a great many, but I only give you this:

Supreme Court.

RICHARD H. GRIFFIN
vs.
HENRY T. HELMBOLD and HENRIETTA B. HELMBOLD. } In error.

Gross amount of sales—

It may have been a sale under a decree of foreclosure or under a judgment; I do not know from this statement which it was—

Gross amount of sales April 26, 1872, $8,982.89.
Charges——

The sheriff, after he sells, does not include the other costs of the proceeding, but merely the sheriff's costs, which will answer for the marshal under the bankrupt law; and the gross amount of his charges in making these sales of $8,900 is $5,103.50, being just about five-eighths of the whole money received upon the sale of one estate under the benign laws of the State of New York; and they are benign; they are right; they do not tolerate this sort of thing any more than does the bankrupt law tolerate an extortion by a marshal, or a register, or an assignee; but it only illustrates what I told you the other day, that there is no more immunity for the honest citizen against extortion under a State law than there is under a national law; and until courts are brought to their duty, and until clients or persons interested in estates choose to take care of their own interests, you may expect, as it always has been since courts and proceedings began, that the people who administer the law will run into abuses. Even this body, Mr. President, as high and as pure as it is, if you look back over its history, will be found to have gone in excess of what it ought to have gone in respect to the fees and expenses of its Sergeant-at-Arms, and its attendants, and its doorkeepers, and its own allowances for this thing and that thing. Nobody is free from the temptation of running into excess unless he is at some time brought under restraint; and therefore you cannot expect that this bankrupt bill, which provides for securing people against extortion, can execute itself without instrumentalities to do it, and unless people take care of their own interests, any more than you can expect that any other law or constitution will execute itself.

I say, therefore, in this point of view which has been referred to by my honorable friends from New York and Ohio, that in turning these people over to the State law you do not relieve them from extortion, you do not relieve them from having their property eaten up by expenses; but instead of holding them up secure against offensive and hostile attack for forty days, to begin with, and then saying that they shall not be proceeded against unless a large proportion of their creditors believe it ought to be done, you turn them over to instant attack on the day they fail to meet a dollar of their debts, commercial or otherwise, by every man who chooses to assail them, and put them at the mercy of every man who chooses to extort from them an unjust preference or an unjust payment. There is where you leave them, exposed to every temptation, and when they have been gone through with and ruined and destroyed to the injury of the State as well as of themselves, you leave them with the millstone of the debt still about their necks.

Now, Mr. President, my friend [Mr. CONKLING] may say that I repeat this too often. Perhaps I do to suit his imagination; but as it is a thing that I believe in, and as it is a truth that I wish my friend could believe in, I shall beg leave to state it as often as I think it is applicable to the particular point that is before you for discussion.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not propose to repeat a single word or idea so well stated by the Senator from Vermont; but there are one or two other considerations that seem to me to be worthy of our thoughts and that militate in my mind very strongly against the amendment offered by my colleague. The more I have reflected upon it, the more I am satisfied that that amendment ought not to be adopted.

The first thing to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate is that this amendment proposes a very great discrimination between the different persons or classes of persons who may be put into involuntary bankruptcy. The thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act, which is now under consideration, and which we propose to amend, applies in some of its provisions to all persons whomsoever. Every man, no matter what may be his occupation, is liable, if he commits some one of the acts specified in this section, to be declared a bankrupt, and every moneyed or business corporation in the United States that commits one of the offenses named in this section is liable to be put into involuntary bankruptcy, and that without any regard whatever to the amount of indebtedness of the individual or the corporation, except that it must be at least $250. That is the only limitation as the law now stands.

Now, what does my colleague's amendment propose? It proposes to single out certain classes of men, to wit, bankers, brokers, merchants, traders, manufacturers, and miners, and say that they shall not be put into bankruptcy unless they respectively owe the sum of $3,000, while every other person, every one who is not a merchant, broker, banker, trader, manufacturer, or miner, may be put into bankruptcy if his debts are $250.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask my colleague to point out that clause. If he can point out that clause, I will acknowledge that I have made the greatest mistake of my life.

Mr. THURMAN. What clause?

Mr. SHERMAN. The clause of the thirty-ninth section which would authorize anybody who was not a banker, broker, miner, &c., to be put into involuntary bankruptcy upon mere non-payment of money.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say for the mere non-payment of money. I said if he did one of the acts that are specified in this thirty-ninth section. A lawyer may be put into bankruptcy not under this commercial clause, but if he shall be guilty of one of these acts, as for instance——

Mr. LOGAN. Guilty of fraud, not for failure to pay a debt.

Mr. THURMAN. To be sure, and we know what "fraud" is. It may be merely constructive fraud and not actual fraud, and yet he is liable to be put into bankruptcy. Now, instead of it being a popular provision, as my colleague supposes it would be, to make this exception, it would be considered as an unjust discrimination in favor of these particular classes, merchants, bankers, brokers, traders, manufacturers, and miners; that you will not allow them to be put into bankruptcy unless they owe $3,000, while you allow everybody else to be put into bankruptcy, although they may owe only $250.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, that comes to the point where my colleague and I ought to agree. If he will point me out any clause in this section that makes a discrimination in favor of the miner, broker, banker, &c., I shall be very glad to concede to him the argument; but I say, under the bill as it is presented to us by the committee, no one can be forced into involuntary bankruptcy for the non-payment of a debt except the miner, broker, banker, and the classes named. A lawyer cannot be forced into involuntary bankruptcy for the mere non-payment of debt. If that were so, I am afraid there would be a great many lawyers who would suffer from this law. There is no provision by which a lawyer can be forced into involuntary bankruptcy except for the commission of some fraud. That is the bill submitted to us. This clause, with my amendment, simply provides that a merchant, trader, or banker, who is presumed to be more prompt in the payment of his debts, if he neglects to pay his commercial paper for forty days, and the amount of it unpaid is over $3,000, he may for that cause alone, although it may be a mere misfortune, be forced into bankruptcy. There is no discrimination against any one or for any one.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to suggest that the discrimination the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] complains of, is made in the bill against those persons. If they fail to pay for forty days, they may be put into bankruptcy, but no other class.

Mr. THURMAN. It is very possible that, having devoted about six weeks of hard labor to this bill, I have some idea of what is in it; but I cannot answer two Senators speaking nearly at the same time. I understand my colleague to say that nobody can be put into involuntary bankruptcy for the mere non-payment of a debt, except he be a merchant, banker, broker, trader, manufacturer, or miner.

Mr. SHERMAN. Forced into bankruptcy.

Mr. THURMAN. That he cannot be?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. That under the bill as it is now presented, nobody, for mere non-payment, can be put into involuntary bankruptcy?

Mr. SHERMAN. Except those specified classes.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask my colleague to take his bill in hand and let us see.

Mr. SHERMAN. Except for cause.

Mr. THURMAN. I will show you that the cause is non-payment of a debt:

That section 39 of said act of March 2, 1867, be amended so as to read as follows: That any person—

I suppose that includes everybody—residing and owing debts as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, &c.

Now we will pass down to line 16:

Or who—

That is, any person—

has been arrested and held in custody under or by virtue of mesne process or execution, issued out of any court of any State, District, or Territory within which such debtor resides or has property, founded upon a demand in its nature provable against a bankrupt's estate under this act—

That is a demand arising in contract—and for a sum exceeding $100, and such process is remaining in force, and not discharged by payment, or in any other manner provided by the law of such State, District, or Territory, applicable thereto, for a period of twenty days; or has been actually imprisoned for more than twenty days, in a civil action founded on contract for the sum of $100 or upward—

Is not that a case of non-payment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. On the contrary, I will ask my colleague whether these conditions act upon a person being arrested on mesne process, or being held in actual custody for payment of a debt, except in case of frauds, crimes, or allegations of that kind made under oath.

Mr. THURMAN. My friend is entirely mistaken; it is not so.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will allow me, the very recital of the acts and the conditions in this clause import an allegation of fraud or a conviction of crime.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not so even in our own State, I will say to my colleague. On the contrary a capias there, either ad respondendum or ad satisfaciendum, can issue for no other cause in the world than that the debtor is a non-resident of Ohio, and you can keep him within the boundaries of the State and keep him in prison. It is not a very hospitable law. I advise, therefore, debtors, non-residents, who get judgment against them in Ohio, to be a little careful how they go into that State; but that is the law. Then, again, there are various other cases in which there is no fraud, and in which there may be a process of execution against the body, as in the case of debts due in a fiduciary relation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my colleague, does not the law of Ohio require in that case before a non-resident can be arrested that there is an intent to leave the State, an intent to defraud?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; it does not require that there shall be any intent to leave the State with any fraudulent purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. But an intent to leave the State.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no fraudulent purpose whatsoever in it. There are other States whose laws are not so favorable to debtors, where arrest for debt does exist in almost all the plenitude that it had before these statutes were passed for the benefit of debtors and to prevent their unjust arrest. So here are two cases in which, when you come to the very substance of it, the arrest and imprisonment, or the arrest and failure to discharge from imprisonment, are nothing in the world but evidence of inability to pay a debt. That was the law before, that is the law now, and we have not changed it except to extend the time from ten days to twenty days.

The effect, then, of this amendment is to make a discrimination, and a discrimination that, in my judgment, would not tend to make this bill popular. I agree that there is some force in what my colleague says, that it is advisable to make this bill popular in the country. I do not know whether you ever can make a bill for the collection of debts very popular. Perhaps that is a thing that never can take place. It might be that with one class of persons a bill to repeal all acts for the collection of debts would be the most popular bill that could be passed. Any bill that may be passed for the collection of debts, and to prevent unjust and fraudulent preferences, will not be popular with some people; that is very certain. Still it is desirable that this bill shall give satisfaction to the public, to those who are likely to come under its operation, or who may wish to avail themselves of its provisions. One of the evils in this country has been that we pass bankrupt laws, leave them on the statute-book for a year or two, and then repeal them; and this is an honest opportunity to make a law which shall be permanent—not that it is perfect. No man ever yet drew a statute at one sitting that was perfect, I do not care how short it was. Nothing but experience perfects a law, and some of the laws that have been longest on the statute-books of this country and Great Britain are still imperfect, and would be intolerable but that shape has been given to them, form has been given to them, by judicial interpretation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is hardly a law in Great Britain now that has not been changed a hundred times.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly; and it is not more than six months ago that a question arose on the statute of frauds and perjuries of Charles II, although the ablest British lawyers writing on that subject said nearly fifty years ago that it was impossible to get up another question on that statute.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. If this amendment should be adopted can a trader, banker, or miner still be put in bankruptcy for an act of fraud, without regard to the amount?

Mr. THURMAN. I suppose he can, undoubtedly.

Mr. MORTON. The effect of this amendment, then, simply would be that one of these classes shall not be put into bankruptcy for nonpayment of a debt unless all the debts amount to $3,000.

Mr. THURMAN. For this particular cause.

Mr. MORTON. But if he is put into bankruptcy for fraud, it makes no difference how small the estate may be.

Mr. THURMAN. That is undoubtedly so. I had not lost sight of that; and I was not saying that this provision might not be put in here and might not be a wise provision if there were good and sufficient reasons for it; but I was answering what had been said about putting this amendment in here in order to make the bill popular. I say it is more likely to be considered as making an unjust discrimination. I was answering what I admit to be an argument worthy of consideration, that we ought to make this bill satisfactory—not popular; we cannot do that; but satisfactory to the people; and I think this discrimination will be most likely to make it unsatisfactory and unpopular.

But there is another objection, which I stated yesterday and which I hoped that my colleague would feel the force of, and that is that by his amendment, as he here proposes it, the indebtedness of $3,000 or over $3,000 is made a jurisdictional fact. Now once more I repeat that you may proceed in the administration of a bankrupt's estate, perhaps almost to the close of it, before the fact is ultimately disclosed that he does not owe more than $3,000; and then all this is for nothing, and the whole proceeding must be suspended. That is the inevitable effect of inserting this amendment as it is here inserted. If my colleague had adopted the suggestion I made——

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will allow me, I will say that I did consider that proposition with attention and care, and I submitted it to persons who have been engaged in the actual execution of this law; and they said that this, like any other jurisdictional fact, was one easily proven, and that the very first step that would be taken under the law by any person seeking to force a debtor into bankruptcy would be to call upon the debtor for a statement of his debts, and he could give that immediately, before any costs were created.

Mr. CONKLING. If I may be allowed to interpose for one moment, it is a stronger case practically than that, because this is an adversary proceeding; it is compulsory and hostile to the debtor, and the debtor knows what he owes. How can it be that he would sit by and allow himself to be dragged through months of proceedings and have it discovered by accident, in the end, that he did not owe $3,000, when he was resisting it all the time?

Mr. THURMAN. Let us see how that may be. Proceedings of involuntary bankruptcy are commenced against a man, and he is called upon to state how much he owes. He says, "I owe but $2,000." Is what he says to be conclusive? Certainly not. The petitioner must have the means to controvert that. Therefore the petitioner says, "You, Mr. Bankrupt, owe John Jones $1,200 more, a debt that you do not put down." The bankrupt replies, "I do not owe him anything at all." Here is a controversy. Then that matter is to be litigated between the assignee of the bankrupt; for first you must adjudicate him to be a bankrupt before you settle the question whether he owes $3,000, in order that suit may be brought against him, or John Jones brings a suit against him, although he is in bankruptcy, and not against his assignee; and when that suit is brought to trial, perhaps months and months after that, and it is established that he did owe the man, then there is jurisdiction. If it is established that he did not owe him, then the whole case goes out of court. Now, the whole thing could be avoided by putting in after the word "provable," in the forty-seventh line, on page 8, the words, "and the aggregate of whose debts shall amount to $1,000." That would make exactly the $3,000 provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain the reason——

Mr. THURMAN. I know the reason my colleague has for not doing that. He says you make it applicable to every one of the cases of bankruptcy. It ought to be if it is put in at all. There is no sound reason in the world why you shall put a man into bankruptcy for one of the causes that are mentioned in the first part of this section clear down to that which we have under consideration where his debts do not exceed $3,000, which will not apply equally well in every single case that you can name. You cannot make any discrimination. What is the reason why you shall not put these merchants, bankers, or traders, into bankruptcy, unless their debts exceeds $3,000? It is nothing but the expense of the proceeding; that is all. There is the same expense in every one of the other cases; so that if this provision ought to be put in one case, it ought to be in all the cases. Then it amounts just to this: that whereas now involuntary bankruptcy cannot exist except where there is an indebtedness of $250, such proceedings shall not exist except there is an indebtedness of $3,000. That is my colleague's proposition. If the Senate thinks that is proper, very well; so be it; but there is no reason in the world to discriminate and say that in one class of cases it may exist where the indebtedness is only $250, and in another class of cases it must be $3,000 or upward.

Mr. MORTON. There may be fraud in one case and not in the other.

Mr. THURMAN. That makes no difference really. That "fraud" is often constructive; but even if it were real—take a case of real fraud—the State laws provide against it. The State laws seize the property of the debtor who has been guilty of fraud. The State laws subject him to arrest and imprisonment if he has been guilty of fraud. There is no reason, therefore, that a bankrupt court should administer his estate in a case of fraud where he owes debts amounting to no more than $250, and that it should not administer his estate if he is a merchant, trader, &c., and has suspended payment of his commercial paper unless he owes $3,000. There is no reason in the world why there should be any such discrimination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the committee's amendment, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Carpenter, Conkling, Fenton, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Ransom, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, and West—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Crozier, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sumner, Thurman, Tipton, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Ames, Bayard, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hitchcock, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Patterson, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—24.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I observe that the Clerk in calling the roll called the name of Mr. AMES. Mr. AMES has accepted the office of governor of Mississippi, and is no longer a member of the Senate, and therefore his name should not be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can make no such order. The Senate has not been officially informed of any resignation by Mr. AMES.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that his name is still called on the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to offer several amendments to the bill, and to save time I will offer them all together, and ask the Clerk to read them as printed, down to the last section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator from Virginia to withdraw his amendment for the present, and let us go on with other parts of the bill, as it is not specially germane to this particular section we are now upon, and he can present it at another time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well; at the request of the chairman of the committee I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will then offer the amendment that I proposed at the beginning. In line 41 of the seventh section I move to strike out "forty" and insert "ninety" before the word "days." I have no wish to discuss it, because it has been already sufficiently discussed. I am afraid the Senators having charge of this bill are so tenacious about it that it will be very difficult to have any amendment put on it, although I think they ought to concede an extension of the period to ninety days. But I will not discuss the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if I were the Senator from Ohio, and proposed the same amendment, I would not wish to say anything about it; but I do not mean that as a reproach to him by any means, because I know he offers it in good faith.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have said all I want to say on the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. President, this period of time was perhaps the subject of as much consideration in committee, this precise point that the Senator now presents, as any one of the topics which the Senate required us to consider. A great mass of the creditor interest, as you may call it, in the Eastern States, complains to us bitterly that by this extension which we have made in the bill as we have reported it, we have destroyed its vitality and have gone over to the other side. Of course, the debtor interest, if it looked to its mere personal interests at a moment, and did not consider the whole effect of the bill, might say, "We would rather have it ninety days; we would rather have it one hundred and twenty days, or two hundred days, or six months; we would rather have it postponed until the millennium before putting in bankruptcy a man who cannot go on, and the sale of whose stock is stopped, unless you are to say he may go on and wind up his estate by taking all the money and paying nobody, or we would rather go back again to the conflicts and difficulties under State laws, of which we have been speaking, and said enough perhaps." Such a debtor might say "Why, give me forever; do not put me into bankruptcy, because I have failed and cannot pay my debts, at any time." Mr. President, we thought we were exercising a pretty large degree of the discretion with which you invested us in reporting to you what we thought was right in extending the time for which a man may stop payment (which, as I described yesterday, and which, as has been decided by all the courts is the principal, who is unable to go on with his business) from two weeks to a month and a half.

What happens in the mean time? Unless he makes an unjust and unlawful discrimination among his creditors, if he stops payment upon the first bill that becomes due, the first bill of exchange or the first note, he must stop upon all those that fall due afterward. If he is honest, of course he stops entirely. Now, what does he do in the mean time, in these forty days as it stands? If possible, he tries to collect in his assets. If he is a merchant he tries to sell off his goods to raise money to meet his engagements and so on. If he is not honest he has this whole period of forty days to make things wrong by a thousand ways that I need not describe. We fixed this time of forty days as the longest period that could be allowed to elapse before proceedings should begin without enabling any creditor for himself to assail the debtor and get by process of law against the will of the debtor, and under the State laws by suit, a preference which the debtor could not avoid, and which the estate could not avoid if the man went into bankruptcy.

Now, if my friend from Ohio intends (and I know he does not) to allow a period so long that a creditor who chooses to be harsh because the man cannot meet his payments, may have time to get a lien that the bankrupt law cannot dislodge as it stands, everybody who wants to do that ought to go beyond forty days; but if you wish, when the man has got to the point where he cannot meet his engagements, first to hold him up as long as you can, and then if there must come a failure, to distribute his assets fairly among all his creditors, you ought to vote against extending the period beyond that time, because in many of the States very short process is necessary to bring the debtor to the question of denying his liability to pay a debt or to admit it. The moment, therefore, a summons is taken out against a debtor who stops payment on a bill or note, he has only a very short number of days in my State, in a large class of cases only six days; in the State of New York I believe it is only twenty days—my friend from New York will correct me if I am wrong—and at the end of twenty days, if he does not meet his engagement, if he does not pay the bill, judgment goes against him. Of course, I am speaking now only of those debts that this section speaks of, undisputed debts, and of honest debtors.

Now take the case of the honest debtor who is sued in the State of New York twenty days ago, and a judgment is obtained. That judgment, being docketed and filed in any county where he has real estate, becomes a judgment lien upon his property, and it is a judgment lien that the bankrupt law does not dissolve, for it is only attachment liens that the bankrupt law dissolves. Therefore, at the end of twenty days, if it was a lien against real estate as you have it now, even, there would be the possibility that the creditor could obtain a preference over the other creditors and dispose of the estate. But in ordinary cases, taking the whole country together, it would generally happen that something would intervene so that the creditor would not get his preferred lien or get hold of his debtor's property, if personal estate was to be sold on execution, within the period of forty days. But if you put it beyond forty days, to ninety days, which is three months, or to sixty days, which is two months, or to any period beyond that time—for, as I say, we strained it to the last degree to preserve equality among creditors in fixing forty—you then expose every creditor to the chance, if he does move, as well as the others within the forty days or the ninety at law, of having the whole estate swept out from under his hands so that he will get no compensation at all out of the debtor's estate; it will all be swept off by one creditor and eaten up by the sheriff's bills of which I gave you one illustration, and I have another in the State of New York; and so it would be in any other State.

Now, I do submit to my friend from Ohio, with earnestness it is true, but with respect to his judgment, that he ought to be willing to take this extension from fourteen to forty days as satisfactory and as the best that can be done to preserve the failing debtor from the rapacity of his creditors under the State laws, and to preserve equality among creditors under the bankrupt law, if the man must fail.

Mr. SHERMAN. As my friend does not seem desirous to have the vote taken immediately on this proposition, I wish to say a word, and I say it with all sincerity and with earnestness, and I hope my friend will regard it so. I have endeavored since these amendments have been reported to vote for them and continue in operation the bankrupt bill. I believe that the majority of the people, I repeat, are opposed to the bankrupt bill. I believe that the public sentiment of my State is against the bankrupt bill, and that I should be naturally expected, in representing them, to vote for its absolute repeal. Such is the course of the great body of my colleagues in the other House, and I think that is the general sentiment of the State. But my own opinion has always been that a bankrupt law in some form ought to be continued on the statute-book so as to enable persons dealing in great transactions in different parts of the United States to appeal to its aid and get relief from misfortune, and that creditors might appeal to the aid of a general bankrupt law through the courts of the United States. Therefore, if I could see that the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee had so modified the previous faults that had been found with the bankrupt law as it was before administered, I should undoubtedly have voted with them. I have been endeavoring all the time to modify this law so as to come, if possible, within the reach of public opinion in my State. But now let us look at it, and see if this bill is not worse in some respects than the act of which it is amendatory. It extends to many persons the thirty-ninth section who are not embraced in the act to which it is amendatory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator point that out?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will. The corresponding clause in the original bankrupt law of 1867 provides:

> Or who, being a banker, merchant, or trader, has fraudulently stopped or suspended, and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend does not find in the act of 1867 the words "manufacturer, or miner." They were induced by the act of 1870 or 1871. We have not changed the existing law a particle in this thirty-ninth section—if my friend will pardon me for interrupting him—except in favor of the debtor, by extending seven days of arrest to twenty, seven days of imprisonment to twenty, and extending fourteen days of non-payment of commercial paper to forty, and (which my friend will notice) requiring one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the creditors to force a man into bankruptcy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am speaking now of the original act of 1867.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am speaking of the law as it stood when we began with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law was amended so as to embrace others, but the law of 1867 is the law under which the great body of proceedings in bankruptcy occur; and that was expressly confined to bankers, merchants, and traders, but now it is extended so as to embrace brokers, manufacturers, and miners. In most of the States there are miners digging coal. There are miners digging gold, but they are generally great corporations. But these coal miners are many of them farmers, the smallest kind of people in this sense. It extends to all mining of coal, so that a man who has coal in the ground opened on his farm, carrying on the business of a miner, is liable to be forced into bankruptcy. So also of manufacturers. It is very difficult to define what is a manufacturer. Is a blacksmith a manufacturer? He makes shoes for horses. Is a carpenter a manufacturer? He builds houses. Are all the mechanics in this country manufacturers? They make things. If Senators will look at the recognized books on the subject, they will find that the word "manufacturer" includes all mechanics in mechanical employments. Although, usually, there is a distinction drawn between a manufacturer and mechanic, yet the word "manufacturer" is a broader word than any other, and includes almost all kinds of mechanical industry where the product of the labor of a mechanic is a distinct article of manufacture, like a horseshoe, in the case of a blacksmith.

The law has gone beyond the original act, including a great number of persons who may be forced into bankruptcy for the mere nonpayment of a debt. Now, I say to you, that so far as the people I represent are concerned, I believe they do not desire the bankrupt law in any case to be enforced against a man who is simply unfortunate. That is the general opinion of the people of my State, and I think my colleague would agree with me if he were present, that if you submit to the people of Ohio, who are just about the average of the people of the United States, the question whether they desire to have an honest debtor, against whom no allegation of fraud is made, forced into involuntary bankruptcy—not where he seeks the benefit of the bankrupt law, but forced into involuntary bankruptcy merely because by fire, by misfortune, by death, by accident, he is unable to pay his debts—the universal response would be no. Bankrupt laws are looked upon by the common people, by the general mass of the community, as laws to prevent men from cheating their creditors, or as laws which are furnished by the law-making power to enable unfortunate men to shelter themselves against misfortune by seeking to be discharged from the liability of debts; and therefore the common idea of a bankrupt law only extends to two classes: first, where a debtor appeals for relief against a misfortune, and appeals to the court to relieve him from the weight of debts that he cannot pay; and, second, where it is applied for by creditors, who seek the aid of the law to prevent their debtors from cheating them out of their debts.

The ordinary administration of the affairs of debtor and creditor can certainly be left to the States; and when you extend your bankrupt law beyond that, you cross the line where public opinion will sustain you. But I was willing to go a little further. I was willing to vote, and am willing now to vote, for this proposition reported by the committee, if the cases are so limited as to be confined to commercial cases growing out of commerce between the States; that is, where the nature of the trade or dealing between the parties is such that it might be called commercial, or commerce between the States, where the rights of the people of different States are affected.

It seems to me, therefore, that I am not asking an unreasonable thing of Senators who desire to maintain a bankrupt law to seek to modify this and ameliorate it, so that it shall not apply to a great number of people who have no intercourse with citizens of different States, but who only carry on a small business at home. I am called upon here to vote for a law which will say that a miner digging coal in the State of Ohio, or a blacksmith, or small manufacturer carrying on a petty business, making his bread by his daily labor, or a small trader selling pea-nuts at a pea-nut stand, or engaged in the small traffic that is carried on in a remote village of two or three hundred inhabitants, selling tapes and little articles in the ordinary small traffic of the country, shall be forced, with their little affairs, into the district courts of the United States remote from them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question? I ask whether in that case it would be anybody but their own neighbors, who found they could not go on, that would force them in? They are not people who deal with New York, with New England, or with New Orleans.

Mr. SHERMAN. I may answer the question before I get through. I suppose in Vermont they have some men that are willing to oppress their neighbors, and we have in Ohio, as they have in all communities; but the best people to settle these controversies between neighbors, according to the theory of the English law, are the people of the neighborhood; and it seems to me that all these controversies that grow out of the ordinary transactions of daily life, where commercial interests are not involved, could be settled better at home. The same argument applies to the extension of this time to forty days. It is not uncommon in the country in which I live for such people as I have spoken of to neglect for forty, or fifty, or sixty days to pay their paper which is past due.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do the laws of Ohio provide in that case?

Mr. SHERMAN. The creditor may sue, if he chooses, and the laws of Ohio wisely give a man on a fifty-dollar debt six months' time, or stay of execution by confessing judgment; and yet this act of confessing judgment might operate as an act of bankruptcy, although it is provided for by the laws of Ohio. I do not know whether they have in the New England States the ordinary stay-laws, by which a debtor upon giving security can get time on his debt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; those have been held unconstitutional with us.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have been uniformly enforced in nearly all the Western States. Public sentiment recognizes them, and defends them, and sustains them. Where a man is sued and cannot pay, if he is willing to give security, and show that he is willing and will be able to pay, and has ability to secure the debt, he has a stay of execution for a reasonable time. Even where the debts are larger the laws are so framed that a judgment cannot be taken except after a certain length of time after suit is brought. Means are given, in other words, to stay execution, sometimes with and sometimes without security.

I do not want to vote to upset the law between debtor and creditor among the people of Ohio unless there is reasonable latitude allowed, and I think that forty days is a less time than should be allowed in an agricultural community, or a mining community, or one such as I represent on this floor, with only one or two large cities in the State. There is no sufficient allowance for the accidents and misfortunes of time. Therefore I desire to amend this provision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did not my friend vote for the original law?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I did, but I do not know. My impression is that I did not vote for the bankrupt bill, but I will not be certain. My friend from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] says I did not, and I think I did not. The Senator representing Vermont may not understand that the general feeling in the Northwestern States is against a bankrupt law, and therefore in representing our people we would naturally go against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand it perfectly. As I stated in the opening, you cannot have any law that everybody in every part of the country will be satisfied with.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have said all I desire to say about this amendment. But let me say a word to the Judiciary Committee and the gentlemen who have this bill in charge. There is a divided feeling not only in the country but in the Senate, and a pretty nearly equal division here. My opinion is that the general judgment of the Senate is that there ought to be a bankrupt law as the fixed policy of the Government, but at the same time the power that is behind us is against the continuance of the bankrupt law; and, therefore, I think those in charge of this bill ought to receive our suggestions kindly and yield just as far as they can to that popular feeling which desires liberality, generosity, delay to debtors.

My friend from Vermont made a remark awhile ago that I did not think it necessary to answer then, but I will answer it now—that the only complaint made about these amendments were that they were too lenient. Now, the mass of the people of the country are not going to write to members of the Judiciary Committee, or even to their own representatives, about their particular views in regard to the bankrupt law, but only creditors who look to this as a law for the collection of debts will write to them more freely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend is mistaken about that. Since we reported these amendments some time ago, and the additional ones that merely perfect the machinery, I think we have had as many letters from the debtor class as from creditors, and who commend, without exception according to my recollection, the amendments that we have made. To be sure, they do not discuss the particular points my friend does. Perhaps they did not think of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The general feeling, however, of the mass of the people, who would not write to the Judiciary Committee or any member of this body, is against the whole law. They wish to strike it out, and would prefer that we should vote for its repeal. I have had a considerable number of letters from intelligent people myself of all classes, who say it is a great deal better to go back to the old condition of things, and let the people of Ohio manage the collection of debts in the State as they did in former times. Still I do not agree with them. My desire is to vote for a moderate law that may be maintained on the statute-book, and I think this law would be stronger and better if you would strike out this whole clause. The Senate having voted down that motion, I have endeavored to modify this section in slight particulars; but I find the Judiciary Committee so hard, so bent upon passing it just as they want it, that they will not give time or consent to anything which compels us to fall back on our original position. I do not wish to prolong the debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely rise to reply in one word to the last statement of my friend from Ohio, which I think on reflection he will admit is a little unfair toward the Judiciary Committee. He seems to accuse us of attempting to be tyrannical, as if we were trying to bully the Senate into doing something they did not want.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that. I said you were too tenacious, that you were holding on to particular forms of words when we desired modifications. I did not say anything about "bullying" at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, Mr. President, is this holding on to particular forms of words? When my friend proposed a change which related to a particular form of words we acquiesced in it in a moment. Although we understood the law to be perfectly correct as it was, and thought his words were entire surplusage, we did not make a question with him. But this is more than form. My friend has not been making a speech here for half an hour on the subject of the forms of words. He is on substance, and he blames, criticises, accuses, the Judiciary Committee of being what he now calls tenacious. Mr. President, why should not a committee be tenacious upon a subject which they have been compelled by the order of the Senate to study, while my friend was at home for the holidays; to study "in season and out of season," in order to get the average sentiment of the country, in order to get the average of justice and of fair play everywhere; and then having come to a unanimous conclusion and reported it here, why should we not be tenacious until some argument shall convince us that we are wrong? I dislike to be arraigned in this way, I may tell my friend, for standing by what after much study we have thought to be right, until we can see that it is wrong.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I think the amendments reported by the committee after great labor are entitled to very high consideration, and I shall be disposed to follow the committee unless in a case where my own judgment distinctly rejects an amendment proposed by them. This is a point where it is proposed that a man may be put in bankruptcy, in the absence of fraud, for the simple nonpayment of a debt for forty days. If there is fraud in the case the creditors need not wait five days; they may proceed immediately. They may proceed at once where there has been no failure to pay a debt, where a man is disposing of his property fraudulently. Bear in mind this is a case where there is simple non-payment without fraud. The old law provided fourteen days. The whole country rose against that with indignation. This bill gives forty days. Now, what is the purpose of extending the time from fourteen to forty days? What is the object of it? It is, as I understand, to give the debtor time to convert his property and pay the debt, to collect his assets and pay the debt. If there is anything in that at all, if that is a good reason for extending the time from fourteen to forty days, it is a good reason for extending it to ninety days. Ordinarily forty days might not be sufficient to enable a man to convert his property, overtaken suddenly by misfortune, some fall in prices, some sudden loss, some disappointment. If he must depend upon the conversion of real estate, forty days is ordinarily too short. Now, give him a reasonable time to make the conversion. I think it ought to be ninety days instead of forty days. He has been guilty of no fraud; he has simply been unfortunate; he has not attempted to cheat his creditors, but some misfortune has overtaken him, it may be through others, it may be through the want of judgment upon his own part; and the object in giving forty days is to enable him to pay the debt that has gone over. I think he ought to have ninety days. Give him a reasonable time to collect his own debts due to him, or to sell his property without sacrificing it; and I ask if ninety days is too short?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you ask me?

Mr. MORTON. I want to ask every Senator. What is the object in giving a stay in the collection of debts now in the Western States? Instead of allowing a debtor's property to be sold at once, the law in my State, and almost every other, gives him a stay. What is the purpose of it? To enable him to realize upon his property and to collect his debts. It is usually six months; in some States it is twelve months; but the law intends to give such a stay as will enable the debtor to sell his own property, realize upon it, and pay the debt, and it gives him a reasonable time to do that; I believe in most of the States it is six months. That is thought to be a reasonable time to enable him to turn around and pay his debts, without having his property sacrificed. Now, here is a delay given him for the same purpose, but it is only proposed to make it forty days. I think the reason of it would extend beyond the forty days. If there is any sense in giving him forty days, there is more sense in giving him ninety days.

And what harm can come of it? Is it anything more than the delay? Yesterday the Senator from Illinois moved to strike out this provision altogether. The argument of the Senator from Vermont was that if there were a time fixed, say forty days, persons would not bring suits in the State courts. Why? Because they would know that at the end of the forty days one-third of the creditors might throw the debtor into bankruptcy, and then they would have to go out of the State courts, and pay their own costs. That knowledge on the part of a man's creditors would keep them from suing him in the State courts for forty days. That same knowledge would keep them from suing him in the State courts for ninety days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How so?

Mr. MORTON. How so? Because at the end of the ninety days his creditors may put him into bankruptcy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But meantime the creditor in the State courts has got his judgment, a permanent lien, and it cannot be disturbed.

Mr. LOGAN. And he can do that in forty days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; he cannot.

Mr. MORTON. Ordinarily he has only to serve process ten days before the first day of the term in nearly all the States; and if it is on a note or commercial paper, where there is no defense, the creditor gets judgment at the first term. It cannot be put off.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many terms are there in a county in a year?

Mr. MORTON. I cannot answer that. That certainly does not meet this argument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend can answer as to Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. The argument of my friend yesterday was, that a knowledge upon the part of the creditors that at the end of forty days the debtor can be put into bankruptcy, and they perhaps have to pay their own costs, would prevent them from bringing suit in the State courts during the interval. Now, I say the same knowledge would cause them to wait until the expiration of the ninety days. But the whole reason of the delay, as I understand it, is to give the debtor time to convert his property. Now, we know enough about business to know that if a man is required to pay a debt of any size by the collection of debts, or by the sale of his personal property, and especially by the sale of real property, he must have more than forty days for it. Ninety days is a short time, and the philosophy of stay-laws in my State, in Ohio, and, I undertake to say, in Iowa, and everywhere else, is, that a man should have six months in which to convert his property and prevent its sacrifice; and the same reason would be good in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does my friend think those stay-laws are constitutional?

Mr. MORTON. They have been held to be constitutional in my State. I believe it was once held that a stay-law passed after a note was given could not affect that debt, because it would be a law impairing the obligation of contracts; but where the law is passed before the debt is created, a stay-law is good, I believe, in every State. I venture to say there is no decision in Vermont by which a stay-law would not be applicable to a debt that was created after the law was passed. It was only where the stay-law is passed subsequent to the creation of the debt that it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States in one case that it was impairing the obligation of a contract.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, though a member of the committee, I believe thus far I have not troubled the Senate with any words on the several questions that have been started in the debate.

It will be remembered that at the last session I introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of repealing the bankrupt law entirely, and the Judiciary Committee at that time instructed me to report such a bill. At that time I was inclined to believe, and rather strongly so, that it were better to repeal the law entirely. Subsequent reflection, taken in connection with the condition of the country, has satisfied me that instead of repealing the law entirely we should seek to amend it and perfect it as far as possible. I believe that this is really the sentiment of the people and of the country. I think that this is the sense and sentiment of the Senate also; and what we are endeavoring to do now is to perfect this bill as far as possible.

During my short and humble service upon the Judiciary Committee I think I am justified in saying that no bill has received more faithful consideration than has this bill. It is certain that upon no one subject before us have we received so much information, so many letters, so many petitions giving expression to public sentiment in relation to the several questions arising. And after the most careful consideration, and comparing the views of the several members of the committee, taking into consideration all that we received from the country, through the public prints and otherwise, we reached the sentiment indicated by the bill reported to the Senate. Of course there are many things in these amendments that persons may differ about, and differ about very reasonably and naturally. You may take the question before the Senate now for instance—the question whether this time shall be twenty days, or forty days, or fifty days, or ninety days, and the number of days fixed is, to some extent, and from some matters that I may refer to, perhaps purely arbitrary. The Senator from Indiana may say that ninety days is a reasonable time, whereas one hundred and twenty days would be but a reasonable time in the minds of others, while forty days would be quite reasonable in the estimate of others. The old law was fourteen days. We have enlarged that three times, made it three times as long, and that number of days we agreed upon after receiving all the information that we could, and looking at the question in all of its bearings, and considering the class of persons that would be affected by the number of days here mentioned.

The Senator from Ohio has referred to the classes of persons that are here mentioned, and I humbly submit that he misunderstands or mistakes the classes of persons that are mentioned here under the law as it now stands. The language is, "being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner;" and he suggests, perhaps not as having very great confidence in the suggestion, that a man who was digging coal would be a miner within the meaning of this statute; and so, as I understand him, a man who was making cigars, or the person who employed him, would be a manufacturer within the meaning of this statute. I suppose I need not say to Senators that "manufacturer" and "miner" and "trader" have an accepted and well-understood meaning in the law, and no one would pretend to say that the person he referred to would be a trader or a miner, any more than a man who was ditching would be a miner, within the meaning of the statute. These terms have a well-understood and accepted meaning in the law, and we know that they embrace a class of persons who are engaged in trade. Instead of having simply the old English bankrupt law, which included traders, we have extended it so as to include in this class these persons who are well understood in the trading world. Therefore I wish to have it borne in mind that we apply this forty-day clause only to those persons who are engaged in these kinds of business as bankers, or as manufacturers, or miners, or traders, they having a well-understood and accepted meaning. But that is not all.

It only applies to these persons when they have failed to pay—I will take the language of the law—where they have "stopped or suspended and not resumed payment;" not upon all debts, not upon every debt they may be owing, but upon their commercial paper, and I think that a very important item in this part of the statute. What is the theory of the law and what is the rule of the law when we come to commercial paper? The theory is, especially when you apply it to what we understand as negotiable paper, that when the days of grace shall have passed, the man who does not pay his paper stands dishonored in the commercial world, because the days of grace having passed he has failed to pay his debt. It is commercial paper negotiable paper, and if he fails to pay for three days his paper is dishonored. Now, we say that after having thus dishonored his paper, this miner, manufacturer, or trader, having dishonored his paper, not after three days, but after forty days, may then be thrown into bankruptcy.

Now, let me call attention to one thing that I think is overlooked here. Senators seem to go upon the assumption that just so soon as a man should fail for forty days to pay his commercial paper every creditor of his in the land will at once throw him into bankruptcy; that the creditors are watching eagerly, seeking the opportunity that so soon as he shall fail for forty days, then they propose to throw him into bankruptcy. Instead of leaving it as it was before, fourteen days, and putting it in the power of any one creditor to throw him into bankruptcy, we have made it forty days, retained the element of commercial paper, retained the class of persons that were provided for in the law as it stood up to this time; and we have further provided that there shall be one-fourth in number, and one-third in amount, of such creditors demanding it before he can be thrown into bankruptcy.

I submit, when you remember that if a man has dishonored his paper he stands in the eyes of the commercial world as holding property not his but the property of his creditors, that that property is subject to their call at any time under the State laws. If we extend the time to forty days it is a reasonable time; and especially as we further provide that his creditors, one-fourth in number and one-third in amount, shall unite in requesting that he be thrown into bankruptcy. I think it is a great mistake to suppose that these creditors are standing here eager to get hold of this man and sacrifice his property. You must remember that this bankrupt law, saying nothing now of its preventive features and looking alone to its remedial features, is intended for creditor and debtor alike, and we are endeavoring to make it so that it will be just for both classes, the creditor as well as the debtor, and I think it is a mistake to suppose that these creditors have no interest in the paper of the debtor or that he shall be allowed to go on and transact business. My own judgment is, and I think experience will prove this, that if he shows an honest purpose to carry on his business and meet his debts, there will not be one instance in five hundred hardly where a man is honestly endeavoring to get along that he will be thrown into bankruptcy. But we are providing for cases where he does not manifest that intention, where he has thus dishonored his paper, and where one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of his creditors think and agree he ought to be thrown into bankruptcy, and the circumstances are such as to justify it.

My friend from Indiana referred to the length of time you can stay debts in the Western and some of the other States. That is true enough; but then the creditor has security for his debt; he is amply secured. Those going upon the bond are required to verify as to the amount of their property, and the creditor is entirely secured.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And gets a preference thereby.

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly, he gets a preference thereby. He has an ample security on the real estate of the debtor, and also on the real estate of those who may go upon the bond.

I submit, then, notwithstanding my strong inclination was at one time to vote for the entire repeal of this law, and though I am inclined to think that my people are divided on that subject, that, really, as it is contemplated by the Constitution that we should have a uniform system of bankruptcy in this country, when once we have such a law on the statute-book we should be slow to wipe it from the statutes, but should keep it on the statutes, amending it from time to time, as experience may justify and point out to be necessary.

Now we have provided for forty days. It seems to me that, looking to the rights of the creditor and debtor, remembering that it is only upon commercial paper, and remembering also that it requires a certain number of persons and a certain amount of interest to throw the party into bankruptcy, that is a reasonable time.

Let me make one more suggestion and I have done. This section also provides, as was referred to by the Senator from Ohio nearest me, [Mr. THURMAN,] "or has been actually imprisoned for more than twenty days in a civil action founded on contract for the sum of $100 or upward." A man, though he is ever so honest, if he is not such trader as is described in this clause, if he is thus imprisoned for twenty days for a debt, may be thrown into bankruptcy. Now we give the man who owes a debt upon commercial paper double that time; and if you say that there is no dishonesty so far as this is concerned, and no fraud, neither is there in the other case, for a man may be just as honest and yet in prison for debt.

I therefore submit, Mr. President, having said this much with reference to this question, and certainly as little inclined as any member of the committee or of the Senate to adhere to anything that has been recommended by a committee unless it seems to be fair and just—I submit that the period of forty days that has been agreed upon by the committee is about as fair as we shall probably get it.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I have some doubt in regard to the propriety or right of Congress in extending the time as is proposed in this bill. The debtor has made an agreement; he has promised to pay for the merchandise which he has bought a certain amount of money and at a definite time, and the time is as much a part of the contract as the amount. The time is as important to the creditor as the amount; and I do not know why we or any other set of men should come in and interfere with that part of the arrangement or the contract so as to impair the value of the debt to the creditor, any more than we could come in and interfere by taking from the amount due. It appears to me, sir, that if I should buy of you a certain amount of merchandise and agree to pay you at a particular time, I then pledge all I have and agree to make all the sacrifices necessary to meet that indebtedness at that time; and if I have failed it is my misfortune or my fault. If, then, Congress can come in and interfere and say that I shall have a longer time, if that longer time is an injury to the creditor, then the Congress violates the contract and diminishes the value of the debt. If time is a part of the contract, and the extension of time impairs the value of the debt to the creditor, then ninety days is a greater injury than forty, and forty is a greater damage than fourteen; and it is a question, and a serious question too, whether it would be right to do this injury to the innocent creditor. He may need the money, as my friend from Vermont suggests, just as much and actually more than the debtor. He may have placed himself under obligations and relied upon the receipts from this debtor to meet them; and if you step in and interpose and prevent him from receiving the amount which is due, you may cause his failure and there will be another bankruptcy. Doubting as I do the propriety of any extension, I certainly shall vote for restricting it to as short a time as possible.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN;] but I desire, however, in discussing the proposition, to call the attention of the Senate to some of the remarks which have been made by both of the Senators who have opposed it, the one from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and the other from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] The Senator from Ohio, in common with the Senator from Vermont, seems to think that there is no such thing as letting up in a moral sense, or in a moral point of view, upon a man who happens unfortunately to be in debt. The Senator from Ohio, however, in his remarks to-day found himself about in the condition he did yesterday, when he made his statement that the constitutionality of a bankrupt law had been advocated by Thomas H. Benton, and therefore he argued that it was constitutional. I do not desire to discuss the question of constitutionality, as that has been long settled. He is as wide of the mark in his statement to-day, that this class of persons who have become bankrupt by a failure to pay at a certain time were the same class as those who are alluded to as in prison, absconding, or acting in such a manner as to produce satisfactory evidence that they were conducting themselves fraudulently toward their creditors. He was wrong in both propositions. In the first place, Benton never did advocate the constitutionality of the bankrupt law of 1841; but he made speeches against it in the Senate Chamber. As I said before, he was just as much mistaken in the proposition that a merchant, a trader, a manufacturer, or a miner is not the only class that, under this clause, becomes a bankrupt by reason of failing to pay in forty days. Under this bill, for a failure to pay in forty days no one can be made a bankrupt save a merchant, a banker, a broker, a manufacturer, or a miner. That is the language of the law. Those persons are distinguished from all other classes. They may become bankrupts by reason of a failure to pay, and they are the only persons included in that exception.

Then, while they are included in this provision, it does, as was said by the Senator from Ohio on my left, [Mr. SHERMAN,] include every class of merchants, every class of manufacturers, every class of brokers, and every class of miners and traders as amenable to the provisions of the law. It includes the man who keeps a pea-nut stand, and the old woman who rents a corner of a street for the purpose of doing a small trading business; and therefore a person of that kind is just as much included as a banker, or a broker, or a merchant. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has already shown that you add to the original bankrupt law in this clause the words "manufacturer" and "miner." Originally none were considered bankrupts except traders. It is true that in 1870 these names were included by an amendment to the bankrupt law; but by including them you have extended the bankrupt law to persons who never were contemplated heretofore by our bankrupt laws. This is tending, in my judgment, to extend the jurisdiction of the United States courts further than is just and wise; it is an attempt to absorb and take from the State courts and all minor courts the collection of debts in the different States of the Union. It is, in my judgment, extending the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in a direction that is other than beneficial to the people of this country, and in such a manner as to extend the jurisdiction over the collection of a certain character of debts that ought to belong to the States and to the courts of the different States.

This proposition may not be considered applicable to the particular point which is raised by the amendment now before us, but is applicable to the discussion which has been introduced here by Senators. I would like to ask my friend from Vermont some questions, but I see that he is not now present. He arrayed here the expenses, costs, and charges of the proceedings under the bankrupt law, and said the average was eighty dollars per case, and argued that this was an inexpensive court. There is one feature in that which he failed to exhibit to the Senate, and it is this: that the cost for service by a marshal is just as much to the poor man or woman who owes but $250 as it is to a millionaire who is to be put into bankruptcy; the cost of the return is just the same; the cost of the order of the court is just the same; and so of all the expenses except the tabulation of the property and the sale where there is an immense amount involved, and the records in reference to them. As I stated yesterday, I do not believe a case can be named that has been adjudicated in bankruptcy, where a man's property was of little value, that the creditor ever received ten cents on the dollar.

This being the case, in whose interest is this bill? I do not mean by what I am going to say that the Senators who reported this bill inclined to any such view or had any such intention; but I do insist that the small amount named in this bill for which you can put a man into bankruptcy, and the short time of non-payment which allows it to be done, mean nothing more or less than to make costs for the officers of the courts and to break up the smaller merchants and traders in this country who are unfortunate in not paying their debts when due.

My friend from Vermont has said that he has numerous letters from people complaining that his committee by its amendments has taken all the vitality out of this law. I am not a member of the Judiciary Committee; but I have a letter here and I propose to read it to show exactly the class of gentlemen who are interested in putting small merchants into bankruptcy and in having a short time fixed for nonpayment of their debts that they may be put into bankruptcy. I have a letter from a marshal, whose name I will not give, for fear he might not think it proper to do so. He writes to me saying that an effort is being made among the marshals and registers and other officers of courts of bankruptcy of the United States to have this law not changed, so that they themselves may live and fatten upon the misfortunes of others as they have heretofore. In this letter is inclosed this printed letter which I will read:

> The registers in bankruptcy for the southern and eastern districts of New York are exerting themselves to the utmost to prevent the repeal of the bankrupt law. Our plan of operation is to procure signatures to a remonstrance against repeal and asking that the law may be amended; to prepare and have published in the newspapers, editorially, articles against repeal, and thus create public sentiment in favor of the bankrupt law.

I have noticed articles in the papers of about the date of this letter opposed to the repeal of the bankrupt law, and thereby public sentiment was being created in favor of this monstrosity, for it can be called by no other name, so far as its operations in the Northwest are concerned.

> We do not see that evidence of diligence in registers elsewhere which we are making in the forwarding of remonstrances. The House repealed the act by an overwhelming vote, and they are supposed to represent the popular sentiment of the people; and the Senate is in great danger of concurring with the House of Representatives. If every register, marshal, clerk, and other officer will perform his duty in this particular, there is no danger of the law being repealed.

That is the language of letters which have been sent to every officer of a bankrupt court in this country, signed by Isaac Dayton, I. T. Williams, David S. Fitch, J. C. White, and Norris Winslow; and that is the manner in which public sentiment has been created throughout this land. Letters, we are told, have been written here by different people throughout the United States. I presume they have been. And while I am speaking on this point I must say that it reminds me of the manner in which public sentiment is manufactured around this Chamber on other questions. Since my term in Congress began I have never known the poor farmer, the poor mechanic, the small merchant, the small trader, or the laboring man to hang around Congress in order to influence Congress to do any act; but I have known the rich merchant, the rich banker, the office-seeker, the broker, the men engaged in large corporations which overshadow this whole country and beclond it—I have known such men by the hundred to hang around the halls of Congress to create public sentiment, and have newspapers in their employ for the purpose of creating that sentiment, just as the proposition is made by these bankrupt officers to create a public sentiment to overshadow the Senate in reference to this proposition.

Sir, while I say these things not applicable to this particular amendment, I think it proper to take the occasion to say them, as I am on the floor, and I may as well do it while the present amendment is pending. I had intended to rise to appeal to the Judiciary Committee to allow the amendment to be adopted. But it seems they stand with the tenacity of life, and hang on to this bankrupt law in every provision and in every feature, as it has come from them, as their common child. Two Senators on that committee, one from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and the other from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] stand side by side and crush down all opposition, all amendments, by the weight or length of their arguments, or the force of their positions. For what? Not because there are not objections to this bill, but because they seem to believe that they are acting in the interest of the majority of the country, in which they are mistaken; and they appeal constantly to us on behalf of the debtors. Why, sir, let me ask those gentlemen how many of the debtors of the country have applied to the committee for the insertion of this provision in the bankrupt law making them bankrupts if they fail to meet their paper in forty days by no fault of their own? I will venture the assertion that there has not been a small trader, or manufacturer, or miner of the class you intend to destroy that has written to you or said one word to you in reference to the retention of this provision of the bankrupt law, but your letters have principally come from the large, overgrown creditors, who assert the proposition that no man who owes a debt has a right to any leniency whatever. I was astounded at the remarks of my aged, venerable, and kind-hearted friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] when he said the day the debt was due the creditor had a right to demand it—and so he has—and that the debtor had no right to leniency; that the money belonged to the creditor, and he must have it on the very day, and there was no power to prevent it. Certainly he must have it under the law; the law gives him the right to it; but the mercy which God has implanted in the heart of every honest man dictates that there should be leniency enough to say to the poor creature, if he is an honest man and has property enough, when money is realized from it, to pay his debt, he should have a little time to turn over and convert his property so as to pay the debt, without oppressing and crushing him to the earth, especially in panic when no man can obtain money.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. If there is to be any extension by the creditor to the debtor, should it not be a matter of contract between them, rather than a matter of arbitrary law by a legislative body?

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I will agree to that proposition; but you are making it a matter of arbitrary law. In your bankrupt law you say if a man does not pay in forty days he shall be a bankrupt. I say I am opposed to that. I would rather leave it to arbitration between the parties, and depend upon the mercy and the good conscience of the man, than the iron and rigid rules of a law to be administered in a merciless manner.

As I said, I am in favor of extending this term to ninety days; and, further, whether this amendment is adopted or not, I shall propose another amendment more lenient even than this. The proposition has been affirmed and sustained, or attempted to be sustained, by Senators on this floor, that there was a moral obligation about a debt, and therefore legislators must carry it out by the iron rule of the law, no matter whom it destroyed or impoverished. I say that that rule does not hold good, and is not a just rule, no more between individuals than it is between States or corporations or between governments. There is such a thing as leniency between man and man and between nations and peoples; and such things ought to exist. Now, what does this provision apply to? I assert here, and I shall be able I believe by argument to maintain the proposition, that this provision in this bankrupt law is contrary to the theory upon which bankrupt laws should exist; and what is that theory?

The Senator from Vermont, who is not in his seat, asserted here yesterday that a bankrupt was a man who could not pay his debts. Everything that he says is taken for gospel in this Chamber. I presume everybody believed it. It is not the fact, however. A bankrupt is not a man who is not able at the moment to pay his debt. That does not make him a bankrupt. What is a bankrupt? It is a man in a state of insolvency. What does insolvency mean? It means the condition of a man without assets sufficient to pay or meet his liabilities. Whenever a man has assets sufficient to meet his liabilities he is not an insolvent, and if not an insolvent, he cannot be a bankrupt, except by arbitrary rule you make him a bankrupt or insolvent. "Bankruptcy" does not mean that a man is insolvent because he does not pay his debts. The word "bankrupt" means an insolvent, and an insolvent is a man whose means, whose assets, whose property, is not equal to his liabilities; and hence he is declared an insolvent.

Mr. THURMAN. Where does the Senator get any such definition of insolvency as that?

Mr. LOGAN. I get it from the word. It is the meaning of the word. I get what I say about the word "bankrupt" from the meaning of the word. I have not noticed it for some time; but when I was a boy and went to school I understood that to be the meaning of it. I will refer to the dictionary which my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has just handed me.

> Bankrupt, n. 1. A trader who fails or breaks, so as to be unable to pay; one who is subjected to the law of bankruptcy.
> Again:
> Broken, in allusion to the custom practiced in the Middle Ages of breaking the benches or tables of those money-changers who had become insolvent. * *
> To make deficient in pecuniary resources; to break. * * * *
> Failure or inability to pay debts—insolvency.

Insolvency made so by law may be one in any condition that you prescribe. And in the construction of the word "insolvent" to mean one who fails to pay was, under insolvent laws, making men insolvent in violation of the true meaning of the word. Of course that is so under your law—it is an insolvency so made by an iron rule prescribed. Does the Senator say that a man is insolvent who has means ample enough to pay his debts? Would you not call a man a solvent man who has sufficient means to pay his debts?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator wants it right now, I will give him the answer in the very words.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. THURMAN. You will find that the same definition of insolvency under the State insolvent laws precisely as has been given.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator alludes to the word as applicable to this bankrupt law, or insolvent laws making so, I agree with him, because you make a man insolvent by law by making him a bankrupt. But I am speaking of the meaning, the understanding of the term. Of course you can make a man bankrupt, you can make him insolvent by declaration of law, if he has $1,000,000 more than will pay his debts; and that is the very thing you are attempting to do by this provision of your act. According to this provision of the bankrupt law, that my colleague attempted to have stricken out yesterday, you say, not that if he fails in his property, but if he fails to pay within forty days, he shall be declared a bankrupt. What does that mean? He shall be declared insolvent; therefore an insolvent debtor. Now, let me put a case. Suppose, as I said yesterday, we have a manufacturer established in Chicago, or elsewhere, who has one million of property; he owes $100,000 of commercial paper; it is past due fourteen or forty days. Under this law you make that man insolvent; make him bankrupt; and yet he has $900,000 more of assets than he has of debts. But you declare him a bankrupt and sacrifice his property. I say it is contrary to the theory of justice, it is contrary to the rule of right between man and man; but you do put it in the power of man to declare a man a bankrupt and declare him insolvent because he cannot meet that paper in forty days, although he may be worth ten times the amount owing by him.

But, say some Senators to whom I have listened, and always with great pleasure, "It is in the Constitution; the Constitution of the United States provides for a bankrupt law. Therefore we must make a bankrupt law." Is that a good reason? The Constitution of the United States provides that we shall have power to make uniform laws on the subject of naturalization and a uniform rule for bankruptcies throughout the United States. "Bankruptices" is the language. What then are "bankruptcies?" Does it apply to men who have a million of dollars more than their debts? Not at all. It applies to insolvent persons who have not means of paying their debts. Sir, in my judgment it ought to be in the province of the States to collect debts as between the citizens of the State, and it should be of the United States and the States concurrently, as between citizens of the different States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me I should like to give a definition of the word "bankrupt" the Senator did not call attention to. I wish to call his attention to Worcester's definition:

> BANKRUPT. This word, as first used in English statutes, carried with it the sense of an offender, which in some measure it still retains in English law, and has always been restricted in England to merchants and traders, or to those who buy and sell for gain. In the United States the term was applied technically by act of Congress, August 19, 1841, to other persons besides merchants and traders; but the repeal of that act in 1843, together with several judicial opinions adverse to this extension of its signification, has tended to affix to the word at present very nearly the same technical definition in the United States which it has in English law; though by popular usage it is nearly synonymous with the word insolvent, being applied to all classes of persons who cannot or do not pay their debts, and not implying generally any imputation of fraud.—Burrill.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the idea I tried to convey.

Mr. SHERMAN. "Insolvent" and "bankrupt" are used as synonyms.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. Hence I maintain that the idea which was incorporated, or intended to be, by the framers of this Government in our Constitution was that bankruptcy should apply to an insolvent, and not to any other man. In my judgment that is the true rule. The bankrupt clause in the Constitution is not to avoid the relative jurisdictions of the United States and the States—to provide a universal mode of collecting debts. It is not intended, nor was it contemplated, by the Constitution that the Government of the United States should provide a universal mode of collecting debts. No such thing was dreamed or thought of at that time. It is a stretch of power; it is a stretch of authority; it is going step by step in the direction of consolidating all the power of the people of this country within the General Government.

O, but my friend says it costs too much in the State court. It is a question for the people as to the cost; it is a question for the citizens; it is a question for the States. The Senator read a list of costs here from the sheriff of New York to prove that the bankrupt law is right. If New York does wrong, that is no reason why the Congress of the United States should do wrong. That does not apply to my State. In my State we have laws for the collection of debts; we have laws in reference to costs; and while you want a man to go through bankruptcy for $250 under your law, a justice of the peace in Illinois has jurisdiction to a larger amount than that, and for five dollars costs I can have a judgment for $250; and yet you would put a man through bankruptcy so that his creditors will not get a cent, nor will the debtor pay a cent; but the costs of the court will absorb the whole fortune of the individual.

Under the State insolvent laws the property is generally divided to satisfy debts, but the debtor is not discharged from any unpaid debts. But you step in and say that this is a beneficent measure, because you do discharge the insolvent of the payment of his debts. Yes, sir; you discharge him from the payment of the debts that his property will not pay, and from the debts that it may pay, if he is a small trader, because you discharge him in such a manner that he pays nobody, pays no debts, but his whole property is absorbed and he is destroyed. And do you tell me that where a man is put into bankruptcy, when the idea is that he has fraudulently refused to pay his debts, his character is not injured so far as the commercial world is concerned, so far as a trader is concerned, so for as his relations are with the trading community? It is an absurdity. We all know differently.

I say to Senators now, and I say to this Judiciary Committee now, that if they are determined to put their bill in a position that the country will have to take the old bankrupt law or have no law at all, they are conducting this bill (I do not say improperly) but in their advocacy of it, in the strictness with which they stick to their propositions, they will either have the law repealed entirely, or it will fall between the two Houses, and then you will have to suffer on under the old law.

There is another point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and that is the theory of bankruptcy—carrying it out in reference to the discharge of an insolvent debtor. The very fact that you discharge the debtor in your bill carries with it, first, the proposition that the debtor is an insolvent man. If he has property to pay his debts, you would make him pay all his debts, would you not? But you propose to discharge him without paying all his debts. Therefore you carry in the very body of your bill the idea with it that he is an insolvent man; that you would discharge him from his liabilities. If the theory of your bill is that a man is insolvent before you put him into bankruptcy, then your act that puts him into bankruptcy when he is not insolvent is not according to the principle with which you started out for the framing of this law. Sir, a bankrupt law should never apply to any but insolvent men; a bankrupt law should never apply to men who are able to pay their debts and willing to pay their debts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do you call an insolvent?

Mr. LOGAN. I call you or me insolvent if we have not means enough to pay our debts, and perhaps we may not either of us have. [Laughter.] But, sir, if we have plenty of means to pay our debts, we are not insolvent, are we?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends.

Mr. LOGAN. That depends on what?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On whether we will do it.

Mr. LOGAN. Therefore, if a man does not pay his debts, he is insolvent. If a man is insolvent because he does not pay when due, I should take it there would be more insolvent Senators in this country than ever were heard of before, if that is the case. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean political insolvency?

Mr. LOGAN. No; I mean pecuniary insolvency. Of course the Senator from Vermont always pays a debt the day that it is due; no doubt of it; but I must say for myself that very frequently I do not. Therefore I am insolvent; is that your theory?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, I think so. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly. I beg leave to differ with you. [Laughter.] I say that I am not insolvent. I have plenty of property to pay my debts—four times as much; but, according to your theory, I am an insolvent man if I allow a note to go past due.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It leaves you in this predicament.

Mr. LOGAN. I know what predicament it leaves me in; I understand it perfectly; and the Senator understands it perfectly well. I expect we are all more or less in that predicament frequently.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend does not understand the predicament to which I alluded.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps not. The Senator alludes to so many different predicaments that it is very hard always to understand what he does mean. He is a man of so much meaning that it requires very great intellect to keep up with his meaning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is why we have this speech, then.

Mr. LOGAN. I presume it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will address the Chair.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not in a condition, I must confess, to go into the razor business, Mr. President, which I should have to do in contending with my friend from Vermont. [Laughter.] But I must say that the idea that a Senator is insolvent because he does not pay his board bill the very day the month expires is a new feature in this idea of insolvency to me. I never understood it that way before; but I must yield, of course, to my friend from Vermont, who says he has given days and weeks of labor to this magnificent bill that he has produced, and I presume he has shed tears over it; doubtless he has, in his sympathy with debtors in this country that were to be crushed, and absorbed, and mutilated, and destroyed by it. I presume he has, because he is a very sympathetic gentleman.

I was saying that a law should never be used for the destruction of men's property who were able to pay their debts; it never should be used as an instrument of oppression; and whenever it is used to put a man in bankruptcy when he has plenty of means and property to pay his debts, it then does become an instrument of oppression by its use. It is a weapon, wielded in the hand of a court, destructive in its character, and not only abusive but oppressive to the individuals that come within the purview and meaning of this particular section. I would not, if it was left to me, vote at any time for a proposition of that kind. I do not believe it is just; and further than that I will say that the bankrupt law has been used, and if this bill passes, having the same principle in it that the old law had, it will be used, oppressively, because the other was. If the other in the hands of merciless men has been used in an oppressive manner, there is no reason why this bill, partaking of the same principle precisely, should not be used in the same oppressive manner.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It requires the concurrence of a large number of creditors, if my friend will pardon me for interrupting him.

Mr. LOGAN. It requires the concurrence of one-fourth of the creditors; that is to say, if you have but one creditor, and you owe him $250, and you do not pay on the day the debt is due, that one man can put you into bankruptcy; but if you owe divers and sundry creditors, it requires one-fourth of them to put you into bankruptcy. That is all the difference. If you owe four creditors, one out of the four may put you into bankruptcy. That is this bill, is it not? You laugh, [to Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I do not.

Mr. LOGAN. Is not that the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not.

Mr. LOGAN. Does it not say that one-fourth of the creditors may?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; then, if there are four creditors, cannot one put a man into bankruptcy?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that is all the number, and that fourth has one-third of the claims.

Mr. LOGAN. If four of us are creditors, and if I have one-third of the indebtedness, I may put you into bankruptcy. That is exactly the bill. If there is but one creditor, he can put you into bankruptcy, no matter how much or how little you owe so that it is above $250. So the rigor of the law can be applied just as well where any one of this character chooses to take advantage of it as it could before.

Now, sir, for these reasons that I have given—and I have detained the Senate much longer than I intended—inasmuch as the amendment of my colleague did not prevail, which would have stricken out this provision entirely and relieved this class from being subject to the bankrupt law, I am in favor of the next best thing we can get, and that is as long a time as possible being given to the debtor in order to turn his property into money or means by which he can liquidate his debts.

Now, in reference to time, my friend from Connecticut said that forty days was plenty of time, that it was a long time for a man to wait for his debt. What time is forty days in a crisis like this, where the money of the country is locked up in iron safes, held by the iron hand of the overpowering wealthy men of the land, and the debtors of the land without the power to obtain the money, because the money is not obtainable? They may be crushed and ground to death by the creditor. I say it is a time when leniency should be shown. You cannot show that within forty days past or forty days preceding, any man with large liabilities could have obtained the money to pay his debts, especially in our country; and who can say that in forty days, or sixty, or ninety days, or one hundred and twenty days to come, the result will not be the same? I do not know how it is in Vermont. I presume it is very different. I presume there a man in forty days can sell all he has; but in our country he cannot do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has so much, I presume.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not because he has so much, but it is because we have so little money. In your State, and in other States where largely the creditor class reside, and where largely the money of the country exists, it can be obtained more readily, I would think, according to the argument of the Senator; but it is not so in our country; that seems to be unnoticed here in this Senate. We are a small country in the Northwest. Of course it will be a long time before we shall be a large country. The time will come, however, when that country will be heard; and the time will come some day in this Chamber when their wants and necessities will be more readily considered than now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; half a dozen if you desire.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask it in all seriousness. My friend speaks about the capacity for the conversion of property because there is no money to pay for it; that we can pay off in Vermont quicker than they can in Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I say according to your argument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator if he has noticed the census tables or any other means of information showing the comparative wealth, by individuals, of citizens of the State of Illinois and of the State of Vermont?

Mr. LOGAN. On a certain other question that will arise in a day or two I will give the Senator to know whether I have examined that point or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But not now.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it has nothing to do with this question. At the time when that subject will come up properly, you will find whether I have made an examination of the relative wealth of this country or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does it compare with the present statement of the Senator very well?

Mr. LOGAN. I am taking your statement. You say you have no trouble in your State in doing it. I say we have trouble in our region of country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does the Senator say we have no trouble in doing?

Mr. LOGAN. I said that perhaps you had no trouble to convert your property in forty days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You said that I said so.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that I said you said so; but to save the Senator any trouble I will say that he did say so, not in so many words, but substantially so, because he argued that forty days was ample time within which to do it, and therefore he did say so substantially.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. LOGAN. If the forty days is sufficient time, then your reasoning would be that you could do it. If it is not sufficient time, then your bill is wrong. Sir, I say it is not sufficient time. If a man has to convert his real estate in our country—I do not know how it is elsewhere—he generally sells for one-third cash and the balance on time. He has to do it. That is the manner in which business is done in our country. Business is done there on thirty, sixty, and ninety days, and four months' time, and sometimes as long as six or nine months, or a year.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator that he cannot always find a customer for real estate in ninety days.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; but in addition to that, that is the manner in which business among traders and merchants is generally done there. I have sold and bought some real estate in my time in my country; and it is generally done on time as I have said. It runs generally for one, two, and three years. That is the usual time; and it is the credit that gives the man the value for his property. But if you force him to realize from his property in forty days it would be a sacrifice, and such a one as no man would wish to see of the property of his neighbor or his friend.

These are facts that I am stating; and whether they bear upon this point or not in the opinion of other Senators, I think that they do so far as my section of the country is concerned; and while gentlemen are legislating for the whole country, I appeal to them not to legislate as though we had but a very small area of country. I appeal to them to look a little further across this continent than they seem to look. I ask that legislation in this Chamber shall be a little more liberal toward all classes of the people of this country than it is likely to be or than it has been heretofore. I warn my friends—and when I say "my friends" I mean my friends—that the shackles of this class of iron-clad legislation, that applies to but a portion of the country and affects injuriously the balance, will have to be stricken off sooner or later. If it is not done here, the time will come when the people will do it in their might and in their force. It will not do for men to stand up here and say that legislation that applies to their individual homes or their individual States is all the kind of legislation that the people of this whole country should have. It is not right; it is not just; it is not proper; it is not fair.

For these reasons, Mr. President, stated much more at length than I intended when I rose, I am in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Ohio; and not only of that, but a proposition that will make this measure more lenient than even this will.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have listened with great attention to the Senator who has just taken his seat, and I think I understand a good deal that he said; and yet, perhaps, I do not understand his position. I infer from what he said that he is opposed to any bankrupt law at all. Am I right in that?

Mr. LOGAN. I have been arguing against this clause that puts honest men in bankruptcy for not paying within forty days. If you ask me whether I am in favor of a bankrupt law at all or not, I will answer.

Mr. THURMAN. That is what I do ask.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not. But inasmuch as the Senate have voted all amendments down and shown an inclination to pass a bankrupt law, I want the best one I can get for my constituents.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator is opposed to any bankrupt bill at all; therefore he is for the House bill pure and simple.

Mr. LOGAN. I am just in the position you were a few years ago. I am opposed to any bankrupt law at all.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know why the Senator should make that remark. I do not know anything that justifies his making that remark.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. THURMAN. And I say further to the Senator I do not know anything in this bill that justifies the personal character of his remarks.

Mr. LOGAN. If I said anything personal I certainly did not mean it.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator seems to be arraigning the committee as if we were here at the beck and call of the hard-hearted creditors of the country to devise means by which they may oppress and crush their debtors—that is the tendency of the Senator's remarks—when the truth is that every provision that we have made in this bill by way of alteration of the present law is for the ease of the debtor. So far from being here subject to the will and obeying the dictation of the creditor class of the community, we have framed a law more lenient toward debtors than any bankrupt law that exists on the face of the globe; and yet we are held up here as if we were a set of hard-hearted men who have no sympathy with misfortune whatever, simply trying to extort from the debtor the pound of flesh, and the blood, too. There is no justice in any such remark or in any such idea.

Pray what does the Senator mean when he says that "the Senator from Ohio thinks that there is no such thing as letting up if a man is unable to pay his debts?" What remark have I made that justifies any such observation as that? Here is a great measure; not a party measure at all, but a measure in which the people of this country are deeply interested; a measure provided for by the Federal Constitution; a measure which we have authority under the Federal Constitution to pass, and which ought to be discussed certainly without anything of heat or passion, much less of personal reflection or imputation of motives.

Mr. LOGAN. I can only say that if I made any improper personal allusion, I certainly did not intend anything personal to the Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. That is quite sufficient.

Now, sir, I have something more to say. I shall not occupy much of the time of the Senate this evening, nor is it necessary. The Senator says I am entirely mistaken about the position of Colonel Benton on the subject of a bankrupt law. Well, it is of very little importance; but to vindicate the truth of history I will show the Senator how that matter stood, for I happen to recollect a little about that. Benton did oppose the act of 1841. Why did he oppose it? He has left on record the reason why he opposed it. He opposed it because, as I said yesterday, the whole essence and substance and practical effect of the act of 1841 was to discharge men from the payment of their debts on their own application. As I said yesterday, out of a thousand cases of bankruptcy under that act, nine hundred and ninety-nine perhaps were cases of voluntary bankruptcy, and that was the feature of the bill which Benton denounced, and which he said was a violation of all the just ideas of a bankrupt law, and of the Constitution itself.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I said nothing more than that the Senator was mistaken in his statement yesterday that the bankrupt bill of 1841 was sustained by Mr. Benton in a very elaborate speech.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say that the act of 1841 was sustained by Benton at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I so understood.

Mr. THURMAN. Not the least bit of it. I heard him with my own ears make one of the—I was going to say—most ferocious speeches against it that I ever heard against any bill. What I said was this, that Benton did maintain that Congress ought to pass a bankrupt law that should apply to corporations and traders, and he maintained that in an elaborate speech in the Senate. He maintained that we should pass just precisely such a law, so far as corporations are concerned, as we now have on the statute-book, and as will remain on the statute-book if our bill should pass.

Mr. LOGAN. I said nothing more than that the Senator was mistaken in saying that Mr. Benton sustained the bankrupt law of 1841. I so understood him.

Mr. THURMAN. That was a mistake.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; then my remark does not apply. I said, understanding the Senator in that way, that he was mistaken, because Benton made a strong speech against it, which he did.

Mr. THURMAN. Then it all comes from the Senator misunderstanding my remark. Here is the objection that Benton had to it. He puts it down in his own Thirty Years' View:

> That Congress abandoned the fundamental principle of all bankrupt systems—
> That is in the act of 1841—
> that of a proceeding of creditors for their own benefit—

That, Benton said, was the fundamental principle of all bankrupt laws, a proceeding of creditors for their own benefit; and that, he said, Congress had abandoned. And then he said further—and made it practically an insolvent law, at the will of the debtor, for the abolition of his debt at his own pleasure.

That is the thing to which Benton objected. He said the voluntary part of the act of 1841 made it a mere insolvent law for the discharge of the debtor from his debts at his own pleasure, and was unconstitutional, and in violation of the fundamental principle of every bankrupt law.

But now the Senator from Illinois, and my colleague, too, have got a definition of insolvency that I think must be rather amusing to the lawyers of the Senate whose attention has been given to the law more than to politics. They say that insolvency means that situation or condition of a man when his property is not sufficient to ultimately pay his debts, and that therefore every man whose assets may, by wise administration and in the course of time, be sufficient to pay his debts, is not, in contemplation of law, an insolvent. They will seek in vain for any such definition of insolvency in any book of the law that ever was written. What is insolvency? Let us see what the courts say insolvency is in contemplation of law; and mark it, they say it not only in reference to bankrupt laws, but in reference to the insolvent laws of the States, and to the statutes of the States which prohibit transfers by insolvents, or in contemplation of insolvency by debtors with intent to prefer creditors.

I first read from a decision of the supreme court of the State of Ohio in the year 1843, in the case of Mitchell vs. Gazzam, 12 Ohio Reports, page 336, in which the court say:

Counsel have labored to define the meaning of the term "insolvency." In the mercantile sense it means a person unable to pay his debts according to the ordinary usages of trade. But in the broad sense used by the statute it means a person whose affairs have become so deranged that he is unable to pay his debts as they fall due.

That is insolvency.

And if, from such a deranged state of his affairs, and the sense of inability to meet his moneyed engagements, he should transfer his property to a trustee to pay his debts, we should regard such assignment as made in contemplation of insolvency, and within the meaning of the statute.

That is the meaning of the statute. And so the first English act of bankruptcy, the statute of 34 and 35 Henry VIII, in describing who are bankrupts, says they "are those not minding to pay or restore any their creditors their duties but at their own will and pleasure."

But, sir, we have plenty of other decisions. I read now from Bump's Law and Practice of Bankruptcy:

The term "insolvency" is not always used in the same sense. It is sometimes used to denote the insufficiency of the entire property and assets of an individual to pay his debts.

That is the sense in which the Senator uses it, but it is never used in a court in that sense.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I stated in the same connection that under insolvent laws and a bankrupt law that made an insolvent by the law, of course the court gave it that construction. Where you declare a man to be insolvent for certain acts, the court can decide nothing else, and hence he is insolvent; but I spoke of the word "insolvent" itself, as to the meaning of the word outside of that.

Mr. THURMAN. The word "insolvent" has a legal signification, and that is the only signification given to it in the courts. Bump says:

The term "insolvency" is not always used in the same sense. It is sometimes used to denote the insufficiency of the entire property and assets of an individual to pay his debts. This is its general and its popular meaning—

Not its legal meaning, but its general and popular meaning—but it is also used, in a more restricted sense, to express the inability of a party to pay his debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. LOGAN. That is where it is restricted by law.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; that is in every statute of insolvency.

It is in this latter sense that the term is used when traders and merchants are said to be insolvent.

Every definition, either under the State laws or under this bankrupt law, defines insolvency in precisely the same way. It is the inability of a merchant, banker, broker, or the like, one of these commercial people, to pay his debts as they fall due in the ordinary course of business; his failure, when they fell due, to meet his engagements. And hence, under the laws of the States which prevent assignments of the assets by a debtor in contemplation of insolvency with a view to prefer any creditor, it has ever been held that although he might have property amply sufficient to pay all his debts ultimately, yet if he had not property sufficient to pay his debts as they fell due in the ordinary course of business, his assignment was made in contemplation of insolvency and came within the provisions of the statute.

Now, in respect to this bankrupt law, I think it will trouble my friend to find the word "insolvent" in it. He says it is the result of statute and of this horrible law, this monstrous law, as he claims it to be. I think it would trouble him to find the word "insolvent" in the whole bankrupt law or in any amendment that we propose, except where it says that the creditor shall have reason to believe the debtor is insolvent, in certain cases where attempts are made to obtain preferences.

Mr. MORTON. And there the word "insolvent" is used in its popular sense.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; the word "insolvent" is not used there in the statute in its popular sense; it is used in its legal sense. Where the creditor knowing that the debtor is not able to pay his debts, as they fall due in the ordinary course of business, attempts to obtain a preference, the bankrupt law deprives him of the benefit of that preference, and administers the estate for the benefit of all the creditors alike.

Mr. MORTON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator his reason, or the reason of the committee, for extending the time from fourteen to forty days?

Mr. THURMAN. I can tell the Senator what I understand to be the reason of it. It is because the law is entirely too severe when it puts a man into bankruptcy because he is compelled, however honest he may be, to suspend payment of his commercial paper and cannot resume in fourteen days.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if the reason is not that a period of fourteen days is not regarded as long enough to enable the man to collect his debts or convert his property? Now, does the Senator think a period of forty days is long enough for that?

Mr. THURMAN. You must fix some limit and you must make a law that will work practically so as not to disturb the business of the country. You give a man forty days. He then has that time to turn around to procure discounts of thirty days' paper, and if he cannot arrange with his creditors in forty days, or procure discounts that will enable him to meet his engagements and prevent one-fourth of his creditors in number and one-third in value from insisting that he shall go into bankruptcy, the chances are, a hundred to one, that if you gave him six months he would be in just exactly as bad a condition; for, mark it, after the forty days expire, still you cannot put him into bankruptcy unless one-fourth of the creditors in number and one-third in amount shall say that he ought to be put into bankruptcy; and when that number do say that, the presumption is fair until the contrary is shown to be the case, that that is the sentiment or would be the sentiment of the great body of his creditors if they were consulted. But in order to guard against a mistake of that kind, if that is not the opinion of the majority of his creditors in number and value, we have provided that they may come into court and represent that it is to their interest that the proceedings should be dismissed, and the court may, if they find that would be for the interest of the creditors, dismiss them.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course that is not a debatable question; but I wish to say that I shall hope to ask the Senate to-morrow to stay here and finish this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Woodworth, supervising surgeon of the marine hospital service of the United States for the year 1873, for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives.

TERRITORIAL COURTS.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Judiciary Committee a bill concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom. I desire that it shall be considered now.

Mr. WHEELER. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. POLAND. I think it will give rise to no debate.

Mr. WHEELER. If it gives rise to no debate I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read.

The preamble states that by the organic acts establishing several of the Territories of the United States it is provided that certain courts thereof shall have common-law and chancery jurisdiction; and doubts have been entertained whether said jurisdictions must be exercised separately, or whether they may be exercised together in the same proceeding, and whether the codes and rules of practice adopted in said Territories which have authorized a mingling of said jurisdictions in the same proceeding, or a uniform course of proceeding in all cases legal and equitable, are repugnant to the said organic acts respectively.

The first section of the bill provides that it shall not be necessary in any of the courts of the several Territories of the United States to exercise separately the common-law and chancery jurisdictions vested in said courts; and that the several codes and rules of practice adopted in said Territories respectively, in so far as they authorize a mingling of said jurisdictions or a uniform course of proceedings in all cases whether legal or equitable, be confirmed; and that all proceeding heretofore had or taken in said courts in conformity with said respective codes and rules of practice, so far as relates to the form and mode of proceeding, be, and the same are hereby, validated and confirmed; provided that no party has been or shall be deprived of the right of trial by jury in cases cognizable at common law.

The second section provides that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States over the judgments and decrees of said territorial courts in cases of trial by jury shall be exercised by writ of error, and in all other cases by appeal, according to such rules and regulations, as to form and modes of proceeding, as the Supreme Court have prescribed or may hereafter prescribe; provided that on appeals, instead of the evidence at large, a statement of the facts of the case in the nature of a special verdict, and also the rulings of the court on the admission or rejection of evidence when excepted to, shall be made and certified by the court below, and transmitted to the Supreme Court, together with the transcript of the proceedings and judgment or decree; but no appellate proceedings in said Supreme Court, heretofore taken upon any such judgment or decree, shall be invalidated by reason of being instituted by writ of error or by appeal; and further provided that the appellate court may make any order in any case heretofore appealed which may be necessary to save the rights of the parties.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 1762) was received, read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON IRRIGATION.

Mr. WHEELER. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House will now resume the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HAYS,] coming over from yesterday, to reconsider the vote by which the House on yesterday adopted a resolution, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be directed to communicate to this House a copy of the paper on irrigation contributed to said Commissioner at his request, in the year last past, by George P. Marsh, minister of the United States in Italy.

The question was upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. KASSON. On yesterday I withdrew my motion to lay this motion to reconsider on the table, in order to enable the gentleman who made it to show reason why this action of the House should be reconsidered. He seemed to rely upon a letter which was sent by the Commissioner of Agriculture to the Secretary of the Interior and communicated by the Secretary to this House, which was read at the time this resolution was offered and adopted. Therefore he gives no new reason, for that letter contained no information not before in the possession of the House. He refers to a clause in that communication which said that it would operate an injustice to Mr. Marsh to transmit the report to the House at this time, and especially exclude it from the report of the Commissioner.

To that point I wish to say one word before I renew my motion. I have to remark that there is no correctness in the statement that this will necessarily exclude the paper from the annual report of the Commissioner. I cannot understand why the Commissioner seeks to thwart the wish of the House to obtain a copy of this document. He will have the same right after this paper shall have been communicated to this House to publish it in his report as if it had never seen the light. This report is not yet ordered to be published, and has not been for two years. I hope that provision may be made for its publication. How long before it will see the light I do not know. But this article is wanted for the information of the public at once. I think there is no force in the objection which the Commissioner raises. It will be optional with him to publish this document or not in his report as he may choose.

As regards the statement that the communication of this document to Congress may work injustice to Mr. Marsh, I wish to refer to a letter from that gentleman, addressed to myself, in which he expresses the opinion that this communication should see the light, and see it early. It is not necessary that I should read the whole letter; but I will give a brief extract, showing the relation of Mr. Marsh's paper to the legislation of Congress upon this subject. In this letter, which is dated Rome, January 1, 1874, Mr. Marsh says:

I had observed in many newspaper articles on this topic a great ignorance in regard to the relation of irrigation not merely to agriculture but to legislative and social conditions, and I was glad of an opportunity of pointing out the danger of rash and hasty action on the subject, and of suggesting legal and material precautions against evils and abuses which will inevitably attend the introduction of irrigation among us unless guarded against by proper legislation and preparatory action beforehand.

I accordingly prepared a paper pointing out the evils and abuses which I have observed, suggesting preventives and compensations, and expressing the opinion that this method may in suitable localities be very largely and beneficially employed among us.

The Commissioner in acknowledging the receipt of the paper stated that Congress had made no provision for printing the report at all, &c.

So much touching the allegation that the communication of this paper to Congress would operate to the injustice of Mr. Marsh, which seemed to imply that I was making the proposition in hostility to the gentleman who contributed it.

This is all I wish to say on the subject. Unless the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HAYS] wishes to make some further explanation, I shall renew my motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, in order that the House may obtain this paper as early as possible.

Mr. McCORMICK. I would like to inquire what is the probability as to the early printing of this paper, if it be not called for by this House?

Mr. KASSON. As I understand, we can get it promptly in no other method than by the House calling for it and ordering it to be printed.

Mr. McCORMICK. I believe this report of Mr. Marsh to be a paper of the greatest possible importance to our Western Territories, where we have so much dry land and where the question of irrigation is exciting so much attention. It is important for the people of those sections to obtain this information at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct as to the value of this paper, for no one is more competent than Mr. Marsh to speak on this subject. He has made the question a special study, as every one must know who has read his work on Man and Nature.

Mr. HAYS. As I understand, the intention of the Commissioner of Agriculture is to include this paper in his annual report. The question as to the printing of that report has been referred to the Committee on Printing, who I understand propose to act upon it in a short time. The insertion of this paper in the report of the Commissioner will give the whole country the benefit of the information it contains. I see no necessity for taking this document from the hands of the Commissioner at this time, and thus interfering very materially with his annual report. I therefore hope that the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will not prevail.

Mr. KASSON. I have already answered the suggestion just made by the gentleman from Alabama. The communication of this paper to Congress, and its publication by us, will not prevent the Commissioner from including it in his report if he wishes to do so. We need the document as early as possible for distribution to those regions of country where this question of irrigation is being agitated, so that they may have the benefit of the very important information contained in the paper. I hope it will be published in both forms—in the form of a congressional document, and also in the Commissioner's annual report.

Mr. HAYS. The Commissioner of Agriculture, in his letter which was read yesterday at the Clerk's desk, states emphatically that the sending of this paper to this House will very materially interfere with his report.

Mr. SPEER. Does not the Commissioner make his report for the benefit of the country, not for his own benefit?

Mr. HAYS. That is my understanding.

Mr. SPEER. Then, if this paper contains valuable information, the sooner the country gets it the better.

Mr. KASSON. As to the statement of the Commissioner that the communication of this paper to the House will necessarily exclude it from the annual report of the Commissioner, I only repeat that the matter will be entirely under his own control. He can if he chooses include the document in his report after we have sent it out as a congressional document.

Mr. HAYS. What reason is there for printing this paper in advance of the Commissioner's annual report, of which it is properly a part?

Mr. KASSON. I answer the gentleman that this information is needed for the benefit of those regions where the work of irrigation is going on. There is not a Delegate from any of the Territories who will not say that this information is required as early as possible.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have received a number of letters and memorials on this subject of irrigation. There was lately held at Denver, Colorado Territory, a convention, embracing delegates from various parts of the country, to take action on the question. We shall ask legislation on the subject at this session, and every document which may present information on the subject should be within our reach at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, I ask the House to let us have this document at once; we ought not to be required to await the printing of the Commissioner's annual report.

Mr. KASSON. I renew my motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The question being taken on the motion, there were—ayes 31, noes not counted.

Mr. KASSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KASSON and Mr. HAYS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes not counted.

Mr. KASSON. I do not ask for any further vote.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House.

Mr. HAYS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty-seven minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on the Public Lands.

COLORADO CANAL IRRIGATION AND LAND COMPANY.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1500) to incorporate the Colorado Canal Irrigation and Land Company, and for other purposes; and the same was laid on the table.

GROWTH OF TIMBER ON THE WESTERN PRAIRIES.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," with the recommendation that it do pass.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

That the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," approved March 3, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and is a citizen of the United States, or who shall have filed his declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, who shall plant, protect, and keep in a healthy, growing condition for eight years, forty acres of timber, the trees thereon not being more than twelve feet apart each way, on any quarter-section of any of the public lands of the United States, or twenty acres on any legal subdivision of eighty acres, or ten acres on any legal subdivision of forty acres, or one-fourth part of any fractional subdivision of land less than forty acres, shall be entitled to a patent for the whole of said quarter-section, or of such legal subdivision of eighty or forty acres, or fractional subdivision of less than forty acres, as the case may be, at the expiration of said eight years, on making proof of such fact by not less than two credible witnesses: Provided, That not more than one-quarter of any section shall be thus granted, and that no person shall make more than one entry under the provisions of this act, unless fractional subdivisions of less than forty acres are entered which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed one quarter-section.

SEC. 2. That the person applying for the benefitof this act shall, upon application to the register of the land district in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the register, or the rece iver, or some officer authorized to administer oaths in the district where the landis situated, who is required by law to use an official seal, that said entry is made for the cultivation of timber, and upon filing said affidavit with said register and said receiver, and on payment of ten dollars, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land specified; and the party making an entry of a quarter-section under the provisions of this act shall be required to break ten acres of the land covered thereby the first year, ten acres the second year, and twenty acres the third year after date of entry, and to plant ten acres of timber the second year, ten acres the third year, and twenty acres the fourth year after date of entry. A party making an entry of eighty acres shall break and plant at the times hereinbefore prescribed, one-half of the quantity required of a party who enters a quarter-section, and a party entering forty acres shall break and plant, at the times hereinbefore prescribed, one-quarter of the quantity required of a party who enters a quarter-section, or a proportionate quantity for any smaller fractional subdivision: Provided, however, That no final certificate shall be given or patent issued for the land so entered until the expiration of eight years from the date of such entry; and if at the expiration of such time, or at any time within three years thereafter, the person making such entry, or, if he or she be dead, his or her heirs or legal representatives, shall prove, by two credible witnesses, that he, or she, or they have planted, and, for not less than eight years have cultivated and protected, such quantity and character of timber as aforesaid, they shall receive a patent for such quarter-section or legal subdivision of eighty or forty acres of land, or for any fractional quantity of less than forty acres, as herein provided.

SEC. 3. That if at any time after the filing of said affidavit, and prior to the issuing of the patent for said land, it shall be proved, after due notice to the party making such entry and claiming to cultivate such timber, to the satisfaction of the register and the receiver of the land office, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that such person has abandoned the land, or failed to do the breaking and planting required by this act, or any part thereof, as hereinbefore prescribed, or failed to cultivate, protect, and keep in good condition such timber, then, and in that event, the entry shall be canceled, and said land shall revert to the United States and become subject to disposal as other public lands, unless again entered under the provisions of this act within the period of four years after such cancellation.

SEC. 4. That each and every person who, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, or any amendment thereto, having a homestead on said public domain, who at any time after the end of the third year of his or her residence thereon shall, in addition to the settlement or improvements now required by law, have had under cultivation, for two years, one acre of timber, the trees thereon not being more than twelve feet apart each way, and in a good thrifty condition, for each and every sixteen acres of said homestead, shall, upon due proof of such fact by two credible witnesses, receive his or her patent for said homestead.

SEC. 5. That no land acquired under the provisions of this act shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of certificate therefor.

SEC. 6. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations, consistent with this act, as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect; and that the registers and the receivers of the several land offices shall each be entitled to receive two dollars at the time of entry, and the same sum when the claim is finally established and the final certificate issued.

SEC. 7. That the fifth section of the act entitled "An act in addition to an act to punish crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1867, shall extend to all oaths, affirmations, and affidavits required or authorized by this act.

SEC. 8. That parties who have already made entries under the act approved March 3, 1873, of which this is amendatory, shall be permitted to complete the same upon full compliance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Minnesota will explain in what respect that differs from the act passed last March.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I reserve the point of order that the bill makes a grant of public lands.

Mr. DUNNELL. If the point of order is to be made I will ask the bill go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made a special order for Thursday two weeks from to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the point of order will not be made.

Mr. DUNNELL. It will not take long to dispose of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have an explanation of it. It seems to be an important public measure.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont raises the point of order. The bill makes a grant of public property and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Minnesota asks the bill be made a special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for this day two weeks. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object, if it is proposed to make it a special order to the exclusion of all other special orders.

Mr. DUNNELL. I suppose there will be no objection if it be made a special order, but not to the exclusion of all other special orders.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not object if it does not antagonize special orders already made. I would suggest to the gentleman to postpone the matter some time further, say to this day three weeks.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is an amendment to the law of last winter, and it is important it should be passed at an early day so it may have action in the Senate in order that the settlers upon the public domain, early in the coming spring, may know how to take their course.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice that on this day week I will endeavor to go into committee on the business of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. DUNNELL. The amendments are few and simple, and the House might consider them at the present time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. As it requires unanimous consent to give this special order precedence over other special orders in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I suggest, if the gentleman will consent to allow the same facility for amendment in the House as in committee, we may consider this bill at this time without the point of order being raised.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is the bill in print?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is in print.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. In its present form?

Mr. DUNNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House, and the question is on its engrossment and third reading.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will explain the difference between this bill and the law passed last March.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I will state the amendments made to the existing law by the pending bill. Under the present law it is made necessary that the entire forty acres to be cultivated with trees, in order to secure the one hundred and sixty acres, shall be planted the first year, the same year the entry is made; that the land be broken the first year, and the same year the forty acres be planted with trees. It will be seen at once by those gentlemen of the House who come from the prairie States and Territories that that provision renders the law wholly impracticable.

This bill proposes the following amendment: that ten acres of land shall be plowed the first year, ten acres the second, and twenty acres the third; that ten acres shall be planted the second year, ten the third, and twenty acres the fourth year. So that the same land must be cultivated as under the old law, yet it gives three years in which to do it. In the first year ten acres of the land are to be broken, in the second year ten acres are to be broken and ten acres to be planted; in the third year twenty acres to be broken and ten acres to be planted; and in the fourth year twenty acres are to be planted—the twenty acres plowed in the third year. That is the important amendment in this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How does it differ, in that respect, from the old law?

Mr. DUNNELL. The same amount is required—forty acres—but only one year was allowed in which to do the plowing and planting. But it was considered that one year was needed, in which the sod should rot, before the planting should commence.

I may say that there is a report accompanying this bill, and that there are in the hands of the committee many petitions, containing thousands of names, asking for it. I may say, also, that this bill has attracted a great deal of attention, and is asked for in all those sections of the country which are intended to be benefited by it.

The old law also provided that the fees should be the same as under the homestead and pre-emption laws. This bill provides that the entire fees shall be fourteen dollars—a fee of ten dollars, and two dollars as a fee when the entry is made, and two dollars when the final proof is offered. This is a reduction in the amount asked from the settler—a reduction of about ten dollars in the aggregate. The old fees were from eighteen to twenty-six dollars, and here a uniform fee of fourteen dollars is required.

Under the old law the persons entering were compelled in every instance to go to the land office and make the entry in person. This, in many sections of the country, involves considerable expense, and is thought to be unnecessary. This bill provides that the person making the entry may do so before an officer of the county wherein the land lies, who has an official seal—the clerk of the court.

Another provision to which I will call attention is that, while the old law required ten years of cultivation, the present law requires but eight. There is also a provision in this bill that a party now on any portion of the public lands under the homestead law may, after the expiration of three years, if he shall have under cultivation ten acres of trees on one hundred and sixty acres, then prove up and receive his patent at the end of three years; while under the present homestead law he would be compelled to remain on the land five years. If he shall plant ten acres of trees, and have those trees in a healthy, growing condition, he will have the advantage of two years over the old law.

I do not recollect that there are any other amendments. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HERNDON] was with myself on the sub-committee, which gave this bill a very thorough and careful examination. I see that he has the bill in his hands, and if he desires to make any statement which I have omitted, I will be glad to have him do so, and yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. HERNDON. I recollect no additional amendments of any importance to the existing law other than those which have been stated by the gentleman who has just addressed the House. This bill is a modification to some extent of the act passed on the 3d of March last. It lessens the length of time by two years. That bill required ten years of cultivation; this requires eight. This bill also assimilates the law to that allowing persons to obtain homesteads. The committee have given the subject a very thorough investigation, and have carefully guarded every point that they thought might be open to abuse in any way by persons seeking the advantage of the act.

It is believed to be the policy of the Government to encourage economy of the timber already growing upon the public domain, and to encourage the further growth of timber. As was stated, the act of March 3, 1873, was not intended or expected to be complete in itself, but simply to be the beginning of a policy inaugurated by the Government. This act is an extension, to some extent, of that act, and a modification of it, so as to carry out that policy more extensively than the first act; in other words, to encourage the growth of timber upon the public domain, and with this view, to grant a portion of the public domain as compensation for its encouragement.

I do not know that I can state anything further than has been stated in regard to it by the gentleman from Minnesota, except that the committee, having carefully considered the bill, are unanimous in recommending its passage.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield now to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CROUNSE.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that the bill is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule. I yielded my point of order on that understanding.

Mr. HERNDON. Before I give up the floor I desire to yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCORMICK] for a question.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Does the bill require that ten acres a year shall be planted; and if so, does the gentleman consider that that is not too much?

Mr. HERNDON. In answer to the gentleman's question I will state that from the petitions presented to the committee and from the information they have received it was not considered that ten acres of trees were too much to require to be planted annually upon one hundred and sixty acres. Those who are seeking to derive benefit from this law did not want to plant in less quantities than ten acres annually. They seem to be satisfied with it; and as the object of the act is to encourage the growth of timber, the committee thought that ten acres were not too much, provided that those seeking this advantage did not ask for any less number of acres.

Mr. DUNNELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.]

Mr. CROUNSE. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House, I move to strike out so much of the first section of this bill as restricts each person who undertakes to avail himself of the benefit of this act to one quarter-section of land, that is, I move to strike out the proviso, which reads as follows:

Provided, That not more than one-fourth of any section shall be thus granted, and that no person shall make more than one entry under the provisions of this act, unless fractional subdivisions of less than forty acres are entered, which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed one quarter-section.

As I understand the object of this bill, it is to promote the growth of timber upon the western prairies. That being its object, it has my earnest support and sympathy. Already we have acts sufficient to grant to each person who desires a home a sufficient quantity of public land for the purpose; more particularly that act which allows a party desiring a homestead to secure a portion of the public domain under certain regulations and restrictions. That, of course, is a very beneficent act, and one which has commended itself to the country.

But, as I understand the purpose of this bill, it is to encourage the growth of timber, and meet one of the most serious wants of the western people. It is not for the immediate benefit of the party who plants the timber, because he can avail himself of the opportunity to secure the land in another direction which he may secure under this act. The purpose of this bill, as will be seen, is to obtain the largest amount of timber upon the prairies, not for the benefit of the individual locater or the person who takes up the land, but for the benefit of those who live round about him, and to induce immigration to that portion of the country. If it is understood that in the northwest quarter of Nebraska, for instance, there are immense forests, immigration would immediately rush in that direction. But as it is, settlers confine themselves to settlements along the streams, where there are here and there a few straggling trees, and they also set out trees, not only for their own benefit, but for the benefit of those who may seek to secure or purchase the timber from them.

Now, if this restriction be taken from the bill, then men of enterprise and capital would go into this matter upon a broad scheme. They would take up perchance thousands of acres of land for the purpose, and the more the better, and proceed systematically with the work. Men who have capital, by means of which they could purchase trees—not the man who has not the means to locate a homestead under the present law, but men who have the capital—would plant the trees and furnish the timber to those who cannot now procure it in any other way. If the object is, as I suppose it to be, to secure the growth of timber, it seems to me that this restriction should be taken from the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. One word in answer to the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. CROUNSE.] We do not propose this bill in the interest of men who want to plant thousands of acres of timber, but in the interest of individual settlers and of poor men. We do not want any one man to have the right to enter large quantities of the public lands under this law. I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska will not be adopted. This bill has been thoroughly examined again and again by the Committee on the Public Lands, and we have conferred with the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon the subject.

Mr. SPEER. I hope the House will not adopt the amendment, because, if I understand this bill, it is to secure not alone the cultivation of timber in our Western Territories, but also the settlement of those Territories.

Mr. CROUNSE. That has already been done under the homestead act.

Mr. SPEER. This would open up the whole Western Territories to speculators.

Mr. CROUNSE. Who would speculate for the benefit of the people.

Mr. SPEER. Who would speculate in the land after planting it with trees. It seems to me to be a perversion of the original true purpose of the act, and would defeat the object of the last Congress in passing the bill which it did, and the object of this present bill. I trust, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] in charge of this bill, whether it does not give the number of acres planted in timber trees in addition to the one hundred and sixty acres allowed under the homestead act?

Mr. DUNNELL. No; the settler enters one hundred and sixty acres, and of that number he must plant forty acres.

Mr. CROUNSE. Let me inquire whether the fact that a man plants timber on a quarter-section only settles that quarter-section any more than if he had set out timber on a hundred quarter-sections?

Mr. SPEER. If you limit each settler to one hundred and sixty acres, then upon a section of land you would have four settlers.

Mr. CROUNSE. They are not settlers merely because they set out timber.

Mr. SPEER. As I understand it, the bill requires that they shall be heads of families.

Mr. CROUNSE. But they are not required to live upon the land.

Mr. DUNNELL. The object of the restriction is to guard the public lands against speculation.

Mr. SPEER. If I understand it, the only persons entitled to the benefit of this bill are heads of families.

Mr. CROUNSE. But they are not required to live upon the land.

Mr. SPEER. It is evidently intended that they shall be personally resident upon it.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I would inquire this of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL:] Under the general homestead act a person can take up a quarter-section of land and settle upon it. Is it proposed that he shall occupy another quarter-section of land anywhere in the neighborhood, provided he plants the timber on that land? If so, that would give him a half-section of land.

Mr. DUNNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The importance of the passage of this bill must be seen at once by gentlemen from the Western States and Territories when they remember the fact that every year thousands of acres of timber land are being laid bare and millions of trees are being sawed up, so that Mr. Emerson, who has written a book upon the Timber Trees of America, tells us that at the present rate of destruction the timber lands of the country will, in fifteen or twenty years, be entirely denuded. Hence we are exceedingly anxious that every encouragement should be given to the planting and growth of timber trees to supply the waste that is continually going on. I hope, therefore, that this bill will pass without any opposition.

Let me add that in most of the European countries there are governmental bureaus of forest trees, having charge of the cultivation and preservation of the trees of those countries. I think the day is not far distant when we shall be under the necessity of instituting a bureau of somewhat similar character.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have received letters from gentlemen in the Territories who make one criticism upon this bill, and ask for an additional provision. In the prairie country the timber is, of course, liable at times to be burned. Hence they ask the insertion of a provision that in case of casualty by fire or other accident, or in case of a dry season causing the trees to die out, the requirement with reference to protecting and cultivating a specified quantity of timber each year shall not operate. I have prepared an amendment to cover this point.

As I understand, the provisions of the bill require that the party applying for its benefit must keep a certain quantity of timber growing and protected each year. The gentleman will see that such a requirement must operate at times as a great hardship. If a settler after years of cultivation should fail for one single season to comply with the requirement, owing to unavoidable casualty, he ought not to forfeit the advantages of the act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that trees planted under the requirements of this act could be protected from fire by plowing around the tract. There is no reason at all why a man planting timber on the prairies should not be able properly to protect it. The requirement of the bill is not onerous. The amendment suggested by the gentleman would render the act entirely nugatory, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. BURCHARD. Perhaps in some cases it may be possible for the settler to provide protection against fire, but I do not think it possible in all cases. Besides, he cannot provide against the occurrence of dry seasons. There are seasons occasionally when it is impossible to keep growing timber, especially planted trees, alive. I understand that this bill, according to the interpretation given to it by the committee, will require that ten acres shall be planted each year, and that the timber shall be protected so as to be kept alive.

The amendment I propose to submit is in this language:

Provided, That if by unavoidable casualty the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, after having broken the required quantity of land and planted the acres of timber required for the second year, be prevented during a subsequent year from complying with the conditions therein required for such year, he shall, nevertheless, upon proof of such fact satisfactory to the Commissioner at the expiration of said eight years, be entitled to final certificate and patent as provided herein.

Mr. SPEER. I have not had time to examine this bill very carefully, hence I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] whether the right of the settler can begin to run until he makes his claim of boundary and files it with the register of the district?

Mr. DUNNELL. Certainly not.

Mr. BURCHARD. I regret that I have not here the communications to which I have referred. I think the adoption of some such amendment as I suggest is very necessary to prevent the requirements of the bill operating as a hardship. When a settler goes on year after year planting the required number of acres, he should at the end of eight years receive his certificate, if he has the requisite number in cultivation, though casualty during a particular year may have caused a temporary failure to comply with the requirements of the act. This bill proposes to require that there shall be planted and cultivated a certain number of acres each year. The amendment I propose is to the effect that if the settler, after going on two years in good faith planting the number of acres required, should be prevented by casualty during one of the subsequent years from planting or cultivating the required number of acres, the Commissioner, upon proof of that fact at the end of eight years, may give him a final certificate of patent at that time, provided he has the whole quantity growing that the act requires.

Mr. DUNNELL. That question was canvassed by the committee, canvassed in the presence of the Commissioner, and canvassed by gentlemen pointing to individual cases of hardship; but if we open that door many men might set fire to their timber or be careless in its protection; and we thought it would be better to pass the bill without any such provision, and the House ought not to adopt any such amendment.

Mr. POTTER. I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota the bill is in the interest of the growth of timber upon prairie lands and not to provide settlers with homesteads. There are other laws for that purpose. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois should prevail, the result would be that nearly every settler would be subject to such casualties, and trees which should be of eight years' growth will turn out to be only of two years' growth.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether we cannot make an arrangement like this: that for every year which is lost by fire or other casualty the settler be allowed an additional year. In case of fire or of a dry season the settler should have an additional number of years equal to the years which have been lost.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think that would be a dangerous provision, and the result would be we would have a great many fires every year.

Mr. HERNDON. The committee deemed that point was sufficiently covered by section 3. That section provides, in the event of a person taking the benefit of this bill who fails from any cause whatever to carry out the provisions of the law within a period of eight years, the entry shall be canceled, but the land does not revert immediately to the United States, but is held open subject to entry again by the same party within a period of two years.

Mr. SPEER. Where is that provision?

Mr. HERNDON. It is section 3, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That if at any time after the filing of said affidavit, and prior to the issuing of the patent for said land, it shall be proved, after due notice to the party making such entry and claiming to cultivate such timber, to the satisfaction of the register and the receiver of the land office, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that such person has abandoned the land, or failed to do the breaking and planting required by this act, or any part thereof, as hereinbefore prescribed, or failed to cultivate, protect, and keep in good condition such timber, then, and in that event, the entry shall be canceled, and said land shall revert to the United States, and become subject to disposal as other public lands, unless again entered under the provisions of this act within the period of four years after such cancellation.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope we shall now have the previous question.

Mr. HERNDON. I wish to state further that covers the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] because the same person who entered this land will have a period of four years after the grant is canceled to re-enter it if he should meet with any such calamity or accident as has been stated.

Mr. LOWE. I offer the following amendment to section 3. In that section, in line 14, strike out "four" and insert "one."

Now, I observe in this section a failure to comply with the provision of the act subjects the party to a cancellation of the entry, all of which seems to be entirely correct; but the thirteenth and fourteenth lines of this section provide the land substantially shall be withheld from the market under any other law of the United States, unless it shall be entered under this act within a period of four years. I suppose the object of this to be that the lands which once have been appropriated to the cultivation of timber shall not be appropriated to any other purpose unless within that period of four years it shall be re-entered under the provisions of this act. While there may be some propriety in thus holding the land open for a reasonable period for re-entry under the provisions of this act, I see no reason why the time should be so extended.

Mr. DUNNELL. If he will make it "two" instead of "one," I will consent to his amendment.

Mr. LOWE. Very well; I will modify my amendment so as to make it two years.

Mr. DUNNELL. Now I call for the previous question.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I should like to ask the gentleman a question before the previous question is called. The bill provides that a party attempting to procure lands under its provisions shall plant so many trees one year, so many the second year, so many the third year, and so many the fourth year. I wish to ask him whether he will not allow an amendment to be offered in the sixteenth line by which the settler may plant the whole forty acres the second year if he chooses to do so.

Mr. DUNNELL. Nothing in the bill relates to that at all. The matter of planting is simply permissive.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota if it is not very probable that the officers of the land office, when requested for a decision on this matter, will decide that it is mandatory instead of being permissive.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think not. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment of those pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso in line 22 to line 27, section 1, as follows:
Provided, That not more than one quarter of any section shall be thus granted, and that no person shall make more than one entry under the provisions of this act unless fractional subdivisions of less than forty acres are entered which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed one quarter-section.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 2 the following proviso:
Provided further, That if by unavoidable casualty the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, after having broken the required quantity of land, and planted the acres of timber required for the second year, be prevented during a subsequent year from complying with the conditions that are required for each year, he shall, nevertheless, upon proof of such fact, satisfactory to the Commissioner, at the expiration of said eight years, be entitled to a final certificate and patent as provided herein.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 3, line 14, strike out "four" and insert "two;" so it will read:
The entry shall be canceled and said land shall revert to the United States and become subject to disposal as other public lands, unless again entered under the provisions of this act within the period of two years after such cancellation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDWARD SAVAGE.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands, or any legal subdivision of the same. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. MOREY. I am instructed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1559) extending the time for the completion of a railroad in the State of Louisiana, from the Texas State line to a point on the Mississippi River opposite Vicksburgh, Mississippi. I suppose under the rule that this bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. This extends the land grant, and will be subject to the same rule as the original grant. The bill must therefore have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

SCHOOL LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, with the recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 1764) to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain fractional townships in the State of Missouri.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Should not that bill go to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. ORR. I think that perhaps it will be found that the point of order does not lie against this bill. It only enlarges the jurisdiction in which the lands may be taken. It authorizes the same quantity of lands to be taken as are authorized by the present law, but provides that they may be taken in the State of Missouri, anywhere, instead of being confined to a certain district.

Mr. STORM. I make the point of order on the bill.

Mr. ORR. It does not change the law in the least.

The SPEAKER. In reference to bills of this kind, there is this difficulty, that if considered in the House they would be open to amendments of a germane character, which would at once send them to the Committee of the Whole. On this ground the Chair must send this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

FORT KEARNEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. ORR, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1406) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation, in Fremont County, Iowa.

The bill was read. In its preamble it recites certain entries made at the Council Bluffs land district in the State of Iowa, on lands which had been reserved for military purposes for the use of Fort Kearney, by order of the President, dated 9th of April, 1846, and therefore illegal. The preamble further recites that the Secretary of War, by letter under date of the 11th of March, 1870, advised the Secretary of the Interior "that the United States military reservation at Fort Kearney, on the Missouri River, is no longer required for military purposes;" and that the register and the receiver at Council Bluffs, Iowa, have reported, under date of May 23, 1870, to the General Land Office, that, due notice having been given to all persons having any interest in the same to appear before them on the 18th day of May, 1870, and show cause why the above-named entries should not be confirmed by act of Congress, no adverse claimants appeared before them. The bill, therefore, provides that the said described entries and selections be, and the same are hereby, confirmed; and that patents be authorized to issue for the same as in other cases provided for by law, and the title to the right of way, depot-grounds, and river frontage acquired by the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, and the Kansas City, Saint Joseph and Council Bluffs Railroad Company, under the laws of the State of Iowa, by purchase from the above-named parties, or by condemnation or release, is hereby confirmed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I believe that bill is subject to the point of order.

Mr. ORR. I desire to state briefly the objects of this bill; and then the point of order, perhaps, may not be insisted on.

The SPEAKER. The point of order will be considered as reserved.

Mr. ORR. The lands embraced in the description in this bill were a military reservation, the old Fort Kearney reservation, or a part of it. The military buildings themselves were never located upon these lands. The fort was removed some two hundred miles west of the Missouri River, and the reservation was years ago abandoned. After the abandonment of these lands, they were deemed Government lands. And the land officers at Council Bluffs, supposing it to be Government land, went on and sold it as they did other Government land, and it was sold to the parties named in the preamble of this bill. It was afterwards found that two railroads had located their tracks and were in operation across this land, and that by the laws of condemnation in the State of Iowa they had secured their right of way; from some they had purchased it, and with others who were not residents the necessary process of condemnation had been gone through with, and the whole thing was regarded as settled.

It has now been ascertained that the Government of the United States has never by any law relinquished its title to this land. There is, therefore, a cloud upon the title of the settlers who have bought this land from the Government. This bill simply releases the technical claim which the Government has to this land, and makes the title good to the settlers, and through them to the railroads who have obtained their right of way by condemnation or purchase.

Mr. SPEER. Is this the bill that passed the last Congress?

Mr. ORR. This bill has never been passed by Congress. The parties in interest are settlers, who obtained their title from the accredited agents of the Government; and this cloud now hangs over their title because the Government has never abandoned its technical title.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ORR] to say that this bill is only to confirm the title to certain lands where the persons now hold title under the Government.

Mr. ORR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. What is the defect in the present title?

Mr. ORR. This land was a military reservation, and it has been since held that it was not liable to entry, although the Government officers allowed it to be entered and purchased.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does this bill release any title to lands held now by persons who have not patents from the Government?

Mr. ORR. It does not.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think that this is a question which should be considered more than we have time to consider it in the morning hour. I therefore insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The bill will go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the General Calendar.

MINTS, ASSAY OFFICES, ETC.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1765) to amend an act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That will be the understanding.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When this bill was last under consideration by the committee the paragraph relating to Army transportation had been read. That paragraph is now open for amendment.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of saying that I do not believe the Committee on Appropriations intend by this bill to do any harm to the Army, nor to place it in a disparaging position. But if the premises assumed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman who has this bill in charge [Mr. WHEELER] are correct, then there will not be sufficient means appropriated for the transportation of the Army. The gentlemen of the Appropriation Committee propose to take the troops from New York, the Eastern States, and the South, and transfer them to the Indian country. Now it is a fact, as I have heard from the Quartermaster-General, that there will be a deficiency for the current year in this matter of Army transportation; that there was not money enough appropriated by the Forty-second Congress to pay for the transportation of the troops for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874. Now, if you propose to transfer the troops from the East and South to the Indian Territory and the border, you will not be able to do it with the means that are proposed to be appropriated. And if you do not transfer them, there will be fewer troops in the Indian country than now. A less number of troops will have to be moved the more frequently upon railroads, or in the regions of the Gulf upon transports, to protect the settlers and border, and this will greatly increase the transportation account.

Sir, I do not believe that this country has yet come to this parsimonious position where they mean to prevent the transportation of troops if there be a necessity for it. Last year the appropriation for that purpose was $4,500,000. It is proposed by this bill to limit it to $4,000,000. Now, if you carry out the theory of the gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations, you must take five thousand troops from the sea-coast and in the South, and transfer them to the Indian country. By an amendment which I understand is to be accepted, it will be provided that no money shall be expended that has not been expressly appropriated. Do gentlemen mean to tie up the hands of the military officers on the frontiers and the borders, when the necessity shall arise, from moving the troops, and force those officers to say that they cannot do it, because the appropriation made for that purpose is exhausted, and that by law they are prohibited from spending any money not directly appropriated? Do gentlemen believe that that is what the country desires?

I do not believe the gentleman from New York desires it; I do not believe the distinguished gentleman from Ohio would desire a thing of that kind. Yet that is to be the effect of this section, if it be passed as proposed in this bill.

Now, I wish to correct the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, that there are fifteen companies of soldiers in and about the environs of New York City. I believe there are but nine. I have carefully looked over the Adjutant-General's report since the remarks of the gentleman were made; and I find that in New York City and in the harbor of New York there have not been more than five hundred troops that were enlisted and assigned to regiments; there are not in the whole State of New York fifteen hundred troops enlisted and assigned to companies. I embrace in this statement the men who are in the Engineer Corps.

Mr. O'NEILL. If my colleague will allow me to interrupt him, I wish he would state where those fifteen hundred men are stationed in the State of New York, and the necessity for their being stationed within the boundaries of that State.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I will do so; I have the figures here. Of the Fifth Artillery there are at Plattsburgh 46 men; at Madison barracks 45 men. Of the First Infantry there are at Fort Porter 37 men, Company A, and 55 Company C; at Madison barracks 40 men, Company B. Of the Third Artillery there are at Niagara 44 men, Company B; at Madison barracks 34 men, Company D; at Ontario 42 men, Company F. The total is 323 men outside of the city of New York. Of the Engineer battalion there are at Willet's Point 253 men; at West Point 76 men, together with a detachment of 214 enlisted men. Now, these troops are all in charge of Government property. If you take them away, you abandon the property of the Government. As to New York Harbor, the aggregate of men there is 394 at the forts—they are artillerists; and there are 52 in the New York City mounted service. The recruits that are subject to assignment I do not include.

Mr. WHEELER. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that we are not to fight this question over and over day after day. The committee by a most decided vote have determined upon this reduction of the Army. They have decided that no matter where the troops may be stationed——

Mr. ALBRIGHT. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] will please not interrupt me. I did not interrupt him; and certainly he has occupied more time upon this bill than I have.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is at fault in two particulars.

In the first place he assumes, as do all gentlemen who speak on that side of the question, that of necessity we must have Indian troubles; that we are bound to have Indian wars, requiring additional troops to be sent to the frontier. Now, there is no ground whatever for assuming that such a necessity is to arise. If we accept the statement of those connected with the Indian Bureau, there is no probability to-day of any trouble with the Indians on the frontier.

The gentleman again is at fault in assuming that the expenses of transportation of the Army for the coming fiscal year will be as much as they were for the last fiscal year. The committee are satisfied that the expense for this purpose need not exceed the amount provided in the bill. I invite attention for a moment to a report which I have here, and which has never yet found its way into print. It is the report of Colonel D. L. Stanley, of the Twenty-second Infantry, in command of the Yellowstone expedition:

SIR: I have the honor to make the following brief report of the marches and service of the troops under my command upon the expedition to the Yellowstone River during the past summer:

The expedition was organized by virtue of Special Orders No. 73, Department of Dakota, dated Saint Paul, Minnesota, April 13, 1873, and was designed for the protection of engineering surveyors of the Northern Pacific Railroad. * * *

1. The transportation, including every wheeled vehicle, amounted to two hundred and seventy-five wagons and ambulances. 2. The civilian employés numbered three hundred and fifty-three men. The number of horses and mules to be foraged were twenty-three hundred and twenty-one.

I say that the Quartermaster's Department is not to be put to any such expense as this for the next fiscal year.

As a final answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I desire to say that this sum was fixed upon consultation with the Secretary of War, who said that if the military force should be reduced as proposed, the amount fixed in the bill for transportation would be ample.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment. I will state my object in interrupting my colleague [Mr. ALBRIGHT] a few moments ago. It has been alleged by him several times that it is not expedient at present to reduce the rank and file of the Army. I wished to ascertain how many troops were in the State of New York and how many in other States, so as to show to the House the absence of any necessity in time of peace for having troops stationed in great numbers in any port upon the sea-board. We have in Pennsylvania three or four military stations. On the river Delaware are Fort Delaware and Fort Mifflin; and in the interior of the State the Carlisle barracks. None of the rank and file are stationed at any of these posts. I understood, I believe, from the gentleman who has charge of this bill, that at the Carlisle barracks, where the Government has very extensive property, there is but one man—a non-commissioned officer, or perhaps a retired Army officer—in charge of that property. I know there is not more than a soldier or two either at Fort Delaware or at Fort Mifflin; and at the ordnance arsenal at Frankford, Pennsylvania, there are only a few ordnance men under command of several officers of ordnance.

In justification of my desire to see the rank and file of the Army decreased, I wish to say that, in my opinion, every available man, if necessary, can be taken from the East to the West for service there, there being no use for men at most stations East, excepting to take care of the Government property. As I understand, the three or four military stations in Pennsylvania require scarcely a man; and why we should have a large force—some three or four hundred men—in the harbor of New York I cannot understand. They certainly can have but little military duty to do. I grant that it is necessary to keep up the engineer force, because the Engineer Department of the Army is going on with important work. I grant, also, that at West Point there should be a sufficient number of engineers, and perhaps a small military force, for the purpose of practically instructing the cadets. But for any fort upon the sea-board, or any arsenal within the reach of the sea-board, there is no occasion for more than a few men to act as watchmen. We have an illustration in the immense barracks which have existed at Carlisle for so many years, where, as I have said before, there is only one——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I wish to reply to the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order; the gentleman has already spoken on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. O'NEILL. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For hire of quarters for officers on military duty; hire of quarters for troops; of store-houses for the safe-keeping of military stores, offices, and of grounds for camps and summer cantonments, and for temporary frontier stations; for the construction of temporary huts and stables; and for repairing public buildings at established posts, $1,500,000.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist that debate shall be confined to the pending amendment.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I have a letter on this very subject. In answer to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania I was going to say, supposing the committee were in earnest, that all the troops in New York and in New England and in the South are to be taken and sent out upon the western frontiers, then the means should be provided for their transportation, and if no such object was in contemplation when the estimates were made it is necessary now to increase the appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order, which I should have made long ago in this debate; this is a special order, and debate on it must be confined to the pending paragraph.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I desire to have read a letter from the Quartermaster-General on this very subject of officers' quarters.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Let the letter be read.

Mr. WHEELER. What is the pending question?

The CHAIRMAN. It is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out the word "dollars."

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I ask the Clerk to read the letter from the Quartermaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I notice in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of to-day that Mr. GUNCKEL, in his remarks of yesterday on the Army appropriation bill, made the statement that the brigadier-generals and colonels on duty in this city have quarters costing the Government for each $2,160 annually. This is an error, as these officers are allowed five rooms each, at a rate not exceeding $18 per room per month, making a total of $1,060 per annum. He also stated that the sum of $1,727 is paid for the rent of quarters for majors; whereas an officer of this rank is allowed but four rooms, at $18 each per month, or a total of $864 per annum. An officer with the rank of captain is allowed three rooms, at $18 each per month, making the sum of $648 per annum, instead of $1,296, as stated by Mr. GUNCKEL. The two rooms allowed to a lieutenant, at the rate of $18 per month each, cost the sum of $432 instead of $864, as stated.

I have deemed this matter of sufficient importance to bring it to the notice of one, like yourself, interested in Army matters, and to correct an impression which may work to the prejudice of the Army, as you will observe that the amounts alleged to be paid are about double those actually paid.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General U. S. A.

Hon. CHARLES ALBRIGHT,
House of Representatives.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. If the committee made their appropriations on the estimates contained in the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GUNCKEL,] then they have acted on a wrong basis, as is proved by the letter just read from the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman's conclusion is incorrect, because the appropriations in this bill were made a month before the delivery of the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GUNCKEL.]

Mr. GUNCKEL. I send up to have read at the Clerk's desk a special report made by the Quartermaster-General to the Committee on Military Affairs. I have not the accompanying letter, but this was sent as a special report in reply to inquiries from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. COBURN.] It gives the name of each officer and the amount paid to each. I did not intend to give these names, preferring to withhold them, but as it becomes necessary to vindicate what I said yesterday, or at least to show on what I founded my statement, I ask to have read the whole report, the names as well as the amounts paid for quarters in this city, showing the sum total to be $122,000, as I stated.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GUNCKEL. I may have mistaken the total amount paid for each officer per annum. In one column the amount is given per month, and in another the total amount; and, as I supposed, per annum, as that was what was asked for. It is probable I have mistaken the total amount for the amount per annum.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The gentleman's mistake is, he gives it for two years.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Let the whole report be published, and it will show the truth. I shall be glad to find myself mistaken, and the amount so paid less than I supposed.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out "$500,000."

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations have undertaken very properly to itemize this bill, but they have not gone far enough. The aggregate of the appropriations as reported is $28,449,916.60. In the item now before the House, $1,500,000 is appropriated for hire of quarters for officers on military duty; hire of quarters for troops; of store-houses for the safe-keeping of military stores, offices, and of grounds for camps and summer cantonments, and for temporary frontier stores; for the construction of temporary huts and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts.

What I want to inquire particularly is, why it is that those items are not kept separate, and the amount to be expended for each specified? Why is it that all those things are grouped together in one appropriation of $1,500,000? And as they are so grouped together, cannot the War Department draw from the Treasury that whole amount and apply whatever portion it pleases to any one of them? Cannot it apply nine-tenths of the whole for officers' quarters, and the remaining tenth to the other items; or such of them as the Department chooses to spend it upon?

As we are itemizing this bill and making specific appropriations for specific purposes, if we intend to retain any control over expenditures, I insist that it shall be said, so much for officers' quarters, so much for cantonments, so much for repairs of public buildings, &c., so that the War Department could not legally spend for officers' quarters what was intended for other purposes; instead of lumping together $1,500,000 as is now done, any part of which can be spent for any one of the things so grouped.

On page 82 of the testimony taken before the Military Committee during this session I find the following recapitulation of the annual amounts paid for rents for officers' quarters and offices:

RECAPITULATION.

Total amount Division of the Atlantic	$110,961 80
Total amount Division of the Pacific	90,132 00
Total amount Division of the Missouri	108,425 88
Total amount Division of the South	43,719 96
Total amount depot at Washington	110,776 08
Grand total	464,015 72

This is certified by General Bingham, the acting Quartermaster-General. I find also that General Bingham states in his testimony that a lieutenant is allowed two rooms and a captain three rooms; a major or lieutenant-colonel, four rooms; a colonel or brigadier-general, five; a major-general or lieutenant-general, six; and then, on being asked the question, if an officer owns the house does he get the rent for the rooms the same as if it was the property of some one else, General Bingham replied, "I think he does." This is all extremely indefinite.

If we are going to allow that system of things, and pay men in that sort of way for three, four, five, or six rooms, in houses whether owned by themselves or not, ought there not to be a separate item for it; and ought not this Congress so to make appropriations that we can see by an examination of the books of the Department how much is spent in that way? I think it ought.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BECK. Is my time out?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BECK. I am sorry that it is. I wanted to say only a word or two more; and I shall seek another opportunity of doing so.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that under existing laws these appropriations are kept separate; that there are forty-three different appropriations for the War Department, and that all these appropriations are now under separate heads. The accounts are kept in that way, although they are not so individualized as I would desire or as the Committee on Appropriations would desire. We have drawn this bill under existing laws. I desire to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that the Committee on Appropriations has now a bill before the House for having these expenditures placed more in separate items both in the estimates and in the appropriation bill. If the gentleman will look at the present mode of keeping accounts at the War Department, he will see there are now already forty-three different accounts in the Treasury Department for war expenses. We have made the arrangement as distinct as we can under existing laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] a question. He will remember that, two or three years ago, a bill was before the House making a very heavy appropriation for permanent barracks at Leavenworth, Kansas. It was defeated. Now, under this appropriation of a million and a half of dollars, is there any obstacle to the expenditure of that money for the erection of those permanent barracks?

Mr. WHEELER. I suppose this must rest altogether in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HOLMAN. The objection taken by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is a very pertinent one. For after a proposition to build up these fortifications has been defeated by a very decided vote of the House, the Secretary of War, in virtue of the power given by this loose mode of itemizing the appropriations, could act independently of the expressed will of the House.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to call the attention of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to the fact that there is a standing law that no more than $20,000 can be spent on any one erection. Inside of that the Secretary has entire discretion.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would furnish a pretty safe restriction.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question. This bill appropriates a million and a half of dollars for these combined items. If it becomes law in that form, is there anything to prevent the Army authorities from applying $1,000,000 of that for officers' quarters alone if they desire it?

Mr. WHEELER. Upon officers' quarters generally?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. I say that, within the limit of the law, not more than $20,000 shall be expended on any single erection; within that limit the Secretary has entire discretion.

Mr. BECK. And I ask the gentleman further, ought it so to be? Ought not Congress to appropriate specifically?

Mr. WHEELER. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] I will only say, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." It is not in the province of the Committee on Appropriations to correct this. If the law is wrong it should be changed; but the Committee on Appropriations have not the power to change it.

Mr. BECK. Is it not the duty of the Committee on Appropriations, when they undertake to itemize the bill, so to itemize it as to control the expenditures, and to confine the Secretary of War to the amount that Congress sees fit to vote for the particular object? If not, why not just give him the whole of the twenty-nine millions in one item, and let the Secretary do what he pleases with it. We should either retain control, or not pretend to do it.

Mr. WHEELER. The committee prepares the Army appropriation bill in accordance with the directions of existing law. If the gentleman from Kentucky desires to know under what particular head the money is expended, he can ascertain it at any time by going to the Treasury Department, where, under the act of 1870, an account is kept under each separate head of appropriation.

Mr. BECK. Allow me a word or two more, and I will not trouble the committee much longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BECK. As I offered the amendment, I will withdraw it and offer another, appropriating $325,000. I do not want to be captious. While I know that the Committee on Appropriations cannot alter the law, and while I know the difficulties under which they labor in framing their bills because of existing laws, still I want to know if we cannot, in some way or other, reduce the enormous staff of the Army. There is where the great cost of the Army is to be found. A reduction merely of the rank and file, while we continue to make appropriations for all the supernumerary officers, will do but little good; our action here will still result in taking immense sums out of the Treasury unnecessarily, as is very clearly indicated by the amount taken for officers' quarters.

I know but very little of military affairs. But I remember some years ago General BUTLER made several speeches which I now hold in my hand, in which he went on to show the enormous number of useless staff and general officers that we have, and also went on to show that in the city of Washington we keep up six or seven military establishments, with great corps of unnecessary officers. The gentleman from Illinois, General LOGAN, then chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, showed to the House by official tables that we had at that time 663 staff officers; that we had in the Army 2½ commissioned officers to every 10 men. He proceeded to show that there were in a staff corps 8 officers with the rank of brigadier-general, while in Russia, with an army of 800,000 men, their staff corps was only 300 officers in all; that in Prussia, with an army of 400,000 men, the staff corps was 100 officers, and so with all the large armies of the world. Yet we, with a small army of 25,000 or 30,000 men, were keeping up a staff of 633 officers, many of them with the rank of brigadier-general. Now I want to know if there is no way of withholding appropriations so as to cut down that portion of the expense of the Army, which exceeds all the other arms of the service in needless expenditures.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has hit upon a point on which I agree with him. Perhaps he will remember that while I was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, some years ago, an examination was had of the general organization of the Army.

Mr. BECK. In this very debate to which I allude the discussion was carried on between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in which I think they differed very widely.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Military Affairs made a report, accompanied by a bill, which was pressed upon the consideration of the House, but not favorably acted upon. It was proposed, as the result of the examination we had made, to consolidate several of the staff corps.

It was there shown that the several staff corps had become enormously overgrown; that when the war ended we had a staff capable of handling a million of men; and that although the Army was brought down to its peace proportions, the old war organization of the staff still remains.

The bill which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Military Affairs proposed that the Commissary Department, the Quartermaster's Department, and the Pay Department should be consolidated into a department to be called the Department of Supply; and that one set of officers, with one set of accounts, and one set of managers, should not only feed but clothe the Army. I have never seen any reason to believe that this is not entirely feasible.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. And to pay the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; and pay the Army. We believe that all three could be done by one staff. And we saw no reason why the Inspector-General and the Adjutant-General's corps should not be united into one as before the war. We knew of no reason why six brigadier-generals and one major-general should be at the head of our staff in the days of peace, when before the war there was no officer on the staff, save one, higher than colonel.

As chairman of a committee that had a right to report legislation on that subject, I did all in my power to secure legislation. But we were assaulted on all sides by those who were unwilling to disturb the personnel of the Army, and were unable to obtain the passage of such a law. Now if, after a complete and full examination, the House has refused to legislate in that direction, of course the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is too well acquainted with the business of legislation to suppose that the Committee on Appropriations can do any such thing. I believe it ought to be done. I believe we shall never be right until we have just as few levers to the great machine of the Army as possible. The Secretary of War should be the political officer between the President and the Army; he should be the political head of the Army. The General of the Army should be its military head. Now he is not; he is substantially without a command. The Army is, in fact, commanded by the Secretary and the staff corps; and this is mainly because of the predominance of the staff over the line. In this respect I believe the present organization and order of things in the Army is all wrong and ought to be changed.

I submit to our friends, however, that it is impossible for us to change it here. I shall myself hail the day when these changes can be made, for I know that they are in the interest, not only of economy, but of the efficiency of the Army. Our Army now is like a half-developed frog, if I may use that comparison without offense to anybody. It is comparatively all head and no tail. The staff corps and the line are overgrown. I have been and am an earnest friend of the Army. I want to see it put on a basis where it will be most effective for keeping alive the knowledge of war, and strong enough to meet all the ordinary emergencies. No nation on earth has better material for an army than we have. Let us put it in a shape where we can be as proud of its organization and efficiency as we now are of the gallant men whose names adorn the register. Let us frame an organization by which service in the line shall be the shortest road to honor and promotion. I believe the most thoughtful men in the Army will agree with the view I here express.

Mr. NIBLACK rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. One word more. The only legislation in this direction we were able to effect was this: In 1869 in a conference upon the appropriation bill, with the present Speaker of the House as one member, myself as another, in company, I think, with my friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] as another, we did succeed in forcing upon that bill a proposition that the staff corps of the Army should not be open to further promotion until they were reduced to something near a peace basis.

That legislation, put upon an appropriation bill on the last night of a session, is almost the only restraining provision that has kept the staff and line of the Army from retaining the overgrown size that they had five years ago. At every Congress since that provision was adopted we have been pushed to the uttermost to reopen the staff corps for promotions. One or two of those corps have been opened; and to-day we are asked to reopen them all. I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will see to it that whenever the staff corps are opened it shall be upon a new basis.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, there have been two speeches on a proposition entirely irrelevant to the one under consideration by the committee. If other gentlemen are to speak, I hope they will speak on the subject of barracks and quarters.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is exhausted. The amendment, as the Chair understands, is withdrawn. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase and manufacture of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and for preserving and repacking stock of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and materials on hand at the Schuylkill arsenal and other depots, $1,500,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend so as to make the amount of this appropriation $1,450,000 instead of $1,500,000; and also to add the following proviso:

Provided, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be used in the purchase of hats, uniform caps, forage caps, uniform coats, uniform jackets, flannel sack-coats, and unlined coats, which articles the Quartermaster's Department shall issue from the supply now on hand known as the old pattern; and none of the articles above enumerated shall be purchased until those now on hand shall be exhausted.

Perhaps I ought to explain this amendment. The adoption of the new uniform in 1872 left on hand in the Quartermaster's Department a very large quantity of clothing, which is just as good and just as serviceable to-day as it was when it was purchased. Articles of the kind enumerated in the proviso just read are now on hand in the Quartermaster's Department to the value of $650,000. But according to the language of the law they are termed "old-style clothing." Now, sir, in view of the change that has recently "come over the spirit of our dream," the people themselves are not standing so much on "style" as they were. They are wearing, on week-days particularly, their "old style" of clothing. The Army is now furnished with entire suits of the new pattern of uniform, which will answer for Sundays and holidays; and it is believed that on week-days the troops can wear the "old style" of uniform. It is believed that under the circumstances now surrounding us, the "Satantas," "Big Trees," and "Shacknasty Jims" of the plains will pardon our troops if they should appear on week-days without "coats piped with sky-blue; skirts on each side of opening behind, faced with sky-blue; with hats with cords and tassels of mohair, ornamented with braid and yellow metal trimmings, as per pattern—with red pompons, white pompons, crimson pompons, red pompons with white tops, with balls and sockets of yellow metal to match." [Laughter.] And, sir, while the private soldiers are wearing this homely attire on week-days, if the officers should happen to forget that "the chapeau should be worn with front peak turned slightly to left, so as to show gilt ornaments upon right side, per general order No. blank," it is hoped the Republic may receive no detriment. [Laughter.] And, sir, as this process of christianizing Indians is going on so fast and so thoroughly, I know they will appreciate a little simplicity in the dress of our soldiers. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, we are all aware of the course which was taken with reference to this matter within a very few years. Somehow, and under somebody's authority, a change was introduced in the style of the uniform for the Army. Whether that change was introduced precisely at the right time or not I cannot say. Whether the old style of uniform might have been continued in use until a little more of the old clothing had been used up I cannot say. The change was thought wise by those who had the matter in charge. I do not now propose to go into the question of its wisdom or unwisdom. The fact of the change remains. There were left on hand many articles of the old style, a very large stock of some things remaining from the war supplies. The Quartermaster's Department continued to issue a portion of these—some are unsuitable, and some exhausted. The old trousers can be used, and the Department is continuing to issue them. The old overcoats can also be used, and are used. But if we carry out entirely the idea of the gentleman's amendment I fear we may have an Army uniformed somewhat like the army that you may find in the gentleman's own beautiful town of Sing Sing, [laughter;] and I think he would himself rather object to that.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman is mistaken as to my locality; I live near the Canada border.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Well, the gentleman has an interest in Sing Sing as a citizen of New York.

Now, a part of this old clothing on hand can be used; but not all of it. For this reason, the Department has been selling off a part of it; and in some places the market has been so crowded with this sort of clothing that the price has been reduced to a ridiculously low figure. From this surplus the sutlers were able to supply themselves at twenty-five cents a garment; and this clothing they would bring to the military posts and turn over to the soldier at, say, fifty cents. The soldier, supplying himself in this way from the sutler, would refuse to draw the clothing furnished by the quartermaster, but would draw, instead, the full value of the clothing in cash. I think—I will not say positively, but I think—that if the gentleman from New York will consult with the Quartermaster-General he will somewhat modify his amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I move a formal amendment to the amendment, in order to tell the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that I have done precisely that thing, and this proviso was prepared in the office of the acting Quartermaster-General—General Bingham.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Then it is all right.

Mr. WHEELER. I have a list in which he has enumerated the articles I have named in this amendment, which he said are as good as they ever were, and should be issued. This proviso is offered at his own suggestion and by his own advice.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. What is the necessity, then, to direct him to issue them?

Mr. WHEELER. He wants the order.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is all right; I am glad to hear of it.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut there is to-day $650,000 worth just as good as it ever was.

The country ought to understand there is to-day about $7,000,000 worth of Army clothing on hand. There are entire suits there, and the gentleman from Connecticut, with that republican simplicity which belongs to all New Englanders, knows an old Army uniform, sound and good, will do to wear on the plains as well now as at any time.

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. WHEELER's amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For preservation of clothing and equipage from moth and mildew, heretofore adopted and now in use, $50,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to strike out the words "heretofore adopted and now." That process, Mr. Chairman, is not applied simply to the preservation of old clothing, although a large amount has been used in that direction, but is also applied to the preservation of new clothing, and to the preservation of tents. The process has been thoroughly tested by a board composed of General Hardie, General Ingalls, and General Lee, of the Quartermaster-General's Department. It seems to be a most efficient process.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out of the bill "$50,000," and insert "$25,000," in line 120.

It is curious that so much money should be expended for preserving from moths the cassimeres, kerseys, cottons, tents, and clothing on hand.

This House was hardly prepared for the statement of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] that there were $7,000,000 worth of uniforms now on hand.

Mr. WHEELER. Not of uniforms, but of clothing, blankets, tents, &c., growing out of the stock accumulated during the war.

Mr. COX. I know, sir, that every day these articles are wasting. Hence these appropriations. The money is to be preservative of the clothes and tents.

I have a report before me from Quartermaster-General Meigs—perhaps the best officer in our service. It shows that we are spending hundreds of thousands to fight moths. They are worse than domestic or foreign enemies.

Before I come to that, may I refer to the report of Quartermaster Bingham, of December 30, 1872? This report shows that then we had $23,435,821.27 in woolen clothing and tents—mostly the former. This did not then include some forty-two thousand blankets, worth $128,000. Nor did this include coats, jackets, trousers, flannel sacks, blankets, goods made up and not made up. These items run into the millions, and the moths run into them. [Laughter.]

Here are $8,000,000 worth of coats, jackets, and trousers. Nearly eight hundred thousand of these articles of apparel for an army of thirty thousand. Our appropriation is a dollar and sixty-six and two-thirds cents per soldier—not per moth. Omitting the woolen blankets and "mounted great-coats," (for the cavalry, I suppose,) and the "sky-blue kerseys," there is a splendid objective point for the army of moths, which no great general of that corps should omit to attack, if feeling well. Did the moths fail? If they did, what need of this appropriation?

In this list we have at least one million and a quarter yards of flannel not made up. We have millions of dollars of this peculiar woolen property not yet made up into uniforms. It is subject to the attack of the moth. A large part of this is still on hand, either in uniform or otherwise. The gentleman confesses to seven millions.

Now, according to the report of the Quartermaster-General just referred to, there were $350,000 appropriated in a couple of years last past for a peculiar kind of process, which is said to prevent moths getting into this cloth and clothing. The Quartermaster-General in this report asks this Congress this year for $100,000. I copy his statement:

The expenditures on account of the moth and mildew proof process of George A. Cowles & Co. during the fiscal year have been $350,000. This includes $200,000 appropriated for the current fiscal year, but made available for expenditure during the last fiscal year. To prepare such articles of woolen and cotton fabrics on hand as have not yet been submitted to the process, an additional sum of $100,000 has been asked in the estimate for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. WHEELER. And we give them half of it.

Mr. COX. Why do you reduce? You give them $50,000. I know that. I still propose to reduce it. I do not understand whether we can by law sell out all this cloth and clothing at once. I hope so.

Mr. WHEELER rose.

Mr. COX. The gentleman knows I have only five minutes, and he must not interrupt me.

Mr. WHEELER. I will not trench on the time of the gentleman.

Mr. COX. You can get the floor at any time.

I would prefer, rather than be fighting moths at such an immense expense, to give these uniforms away. Observe those eminent colored patriots in the gallery. They sit with us so regularly. [Great laughter.] They toil not, [laughter,] neither do they spin. They are the lilies of the valley! Yet Solomon in all his glory would not be arrayed like them if they were clothed with these "sky-blue" uniforms! [Renewed laughter.] They sit yonder, uniformly, day after day; and why not in uniform? Let them appear in the gallery properly arrayed in the colors of the Republic—heavenly blue! [Laughter.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, any man who does business, instead of paying at the rate of three or four hundred thousand dollars in two or three years to prevent moths from getting into clothing, would sell the whole concern out. Moths are the evidence of laziness and negligence. But I am growing personal. It takes more to keep out the moths than the clothing and cloths are worth according to our systems of finance. It is very curious that I find so much "motheaten clothing" sold. At the depots of Jeffersonville and Philadelphia alone, according to the Quartermaster's report, there was sold as follows:

Year.	Jeffersonville.	Philadelphia.	Total.
1869	$149,478 17	$791,995 28	$941,473 45
1870	91,525 23	191,040 48	282,565 71
Total	302,024 60	1,148,003 89	1,450,028 49

If motheaten clothes bring so much, what is the rest, the unmotheaten, worth? Who buys the motheaten clothes and cloth? Who judges of the extent of the damage of the innocent and hungry moth? Where are the expert contractors and tailors? I pass this by, to insist on the practical question, why do we keep such a lot of clothing on hand to feed moths? This is not a political conundrum. Why, if there is so much clothing on hand, does the Quartermaster say that the appropriation for clothing for the past fiscal year was $900,000? Why were the expenditures on account of clothing and equipage during the same period $858,412.07?

O, it is said that there are new styles. Oh, oui Monsieur le Président! New styles! New uniforms are ordered for the Army. Well, why should not the fresh fashions be made of new goods, under fresh contracts, from time to time? Why not foil the moth of his prey?

Now, sir, what, or rather who, are these moths? It is a matter of much concern to our families. Our women ought to know. Science ought to tell us. Scripture—ah! I see my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is impatient. He is about to rise. I am afraid he will make a scriptural illustration. He is thinking of that place where "moth and rust do not corrupt, [laughter,] and——

Several VOICES. "Where thieves break through and steal."

Mr. COX. I did not know the House was so accomplished in the Scriptures. [Laughter.]

I think the gentleman from Massachusetts was about to apply it to the democratic side of the House. I have anticipated him by a more appropriate application. The whole House, including the lilies of the gallery, know just where this quotation fits.

What is the moth, Mr. Chairman? I have looked him up, [laughter,] and [holding up an illustration in Chambers's Encyclopædia, volume 6] there he is. [Great laughter.] There are several kinds.

The moth is a burglar, a nocturnal rascal. There are many families of them. It is worth while, since it costs us nearly half a million to watch this enemy, to know his power. Do not think it insignificant, because it is of the butterfly species. It bristles with antennæ. From base to apex these antennæ are pectinated, especially in the males, [laughter;] and they are formidable either in the larva or chrysalis state. I speak not of their beauty of color; I prefer to refer to the number of their eggs. If there is one moth I prefer to another it is the hawk-moth; but the Lackey is the one I have here pictorially illustrated, [holding up the volume.] The lackey-moth is represented in politics: first by this belt of eggs; second, as the caterpillar, third as the pupa in the cocoon, and then the full-fledged insect for which we pay so much in this Army bill. [Laughter.]

Now, after this analysis of this insect, I would like to know from the distinguished gentleman from New York, my colleague, [Mr. WHEELER,] whether the moth, to protect our Army clothing from which he would give this $50,000, is the Phalæna moth of Linnæus or the Lepidopter of other scientists. [Laughter.] Let there be no shirking that question. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman must allow me some time to refresh my entomological knowledge. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I knew that I could not get a satisfactory reply. When I first read the item in this bill appropriating $50,000 for protection against moths in the Army, and when I read that $350,000 had already been expended for that purpose, I wondered, in my simplicity, why so much money should be spent for such a purpose, when we might so easily economize by selling out our old and unfashionable Army clothes. Casting about, in my simple way, I remembered that the only preventive of moths was snuff. Then, as an economist, I looked up the price of snuff, and the tariff on snuff. I found the tariff was fifty cents per pound. Every sneeze was about a cent, to protect American manufacturers from foreign sneezes. Hence, I was about to tell how much it would cost us, tariff and all, to prevent these destructive moths, by using this article of snuff, when, lo! I found an adjutant in my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

This pamphlet is the result of our inquiries: "Preservation of clothing and equipage of the Army and Navy by the process of Cowles & Co., for the prevention of destruction by moth," &c. This is just out—1873. There is no tobacco, no pepper, no camphor, no leather-chips, which our mothers used. In plain words, they use some sort of solution. I guess it smells badly—perhaps petroleum; but whatever it is it costs money, and has the imprimatur of our best officers. This pamphlet has a tolerably fair representation of the results of the microscopic Tinean caterpillar, which breaks its egg and goes into a cocoon made out of the stuff it feeds on, at the rate of, say, $50,000 a year. But how does this plan we pay so much for save our Government? Messrs. Cowles & Co. say that they soak every thread and fiber.

They leave the goods in the solution for hours; then knead the goods in the fluid. Then they dry them on a machine which makes, I think, nine hundred revolutions per minute. This makes the saturation perfect. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to ask my colleague a question. Has he studied the history of the party moth? It has fed on his party, and no chemical process has yet been invented, I believe, to stay its ravages. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I omitted, as the House will see, out of deference to the majority and their feelings, to draw any partisan or political lesson out of these moths and their predatory habits. [Laughter.] I have materials, however, for a speech of an hour and a quarter on that point. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say it is mostly in connection with the Administration. [Laughter.]

And, sir, since I am challenged to it by my friend—not provoked, for he never provokes any one, except to admire him and love him the more one knows him—I will endeavor to read in the life and character of the moth some of those attributes which are making the people regard the Administration so carefully.

The real moth that we have to deal with, in a political way, is a combination of the lackey-moth, which generally haunts the White House and hovers about the purlieus of power, and the hawk-moth, which is sometimes in the Army, or educated there. All these moths you will find have a political and destructive significance. If you note how they are hatched; how they hide in cocoons; how they creep into dark places through crannies; how they go into closets where goods are stored; how they lie all summer quietly—— [Laughter, the members gathering about the speaker.]

Mr. FIELD. I rise to a question of order. Let the House be brought to order. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I hope my friend of the elegant toilet will come down this way. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS. "Go on!" "Go on!"

Mr. WHEELER. I hope my colleague will have unanimous consent to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly. I yield all my time to him.

Mr. COX. I thank the gentleman and the House very kindly. It is not often that we have a scientific question which requires such analytic research like this before us. It is not often the Committee of the Whole is engaged in the mysterious analogies of nature and politics. It is not often, as a friend near me remarks, that I take the floor on questions of this kind. [Laughter.]

But it seems to me that something ought to be said to justify these moth appropriations—and said a little more seriously. May I quote from Harris's Treatise on Insects, to illustrate the physical and political relations of the moth? ["Go on!"]

The clothes-moth, in its natural state—

Like the politician—

never leaves its cocoon until it emerges therefrom as a winged moth. Wherever it is seen as a naked worm, it is because it has been disturbed and knocked out of its case—

For example, by an election or otherwise. I am told those scientists, the grangers, are going after the naked worm—and in these instances the moth—

And just so also the politician—

does not feed, but in a few days dies.

How sad the thought, but how true the analogy! [Laughter.]

And then the eggs, according to certain French authors——

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] will not do that. This is the only matter in connection with the Army which has not yet been discussed. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I would like to get the fullest information about the habits of the creatures that the gentleman from New York is discussing; and I wish him to mention, when these moths die, whether other moths take their places.

Mr. COX. That depends upon whether they have a navy-yard in their district. [Great laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the House very much longer; it is so good-natured. I would read a few more scientific extracts, with a view to a political lesson:

The eggs [according to Latreille and Duponchel, from whose works the following remarks are chiefly extracted] are hatched in fifteen days, and the little whitish caterpillars or moth-worms proceeding therefrom immediately begin to gnaw the substances within their reach.

Just as a man from a district like that of my friend would reach out quietly with his antennæ after the little patronage here and there floating about a navy-yard. It is perfectly natural. I think I did it myself when I was in accord with the Administration in 1856. One or two postmasters, I think, sufficed as the "substances" I began upon. Since then—and how long it seems—our side have not even had the opportunity of acting the moth upon the national patronage.

Again I read:

The little whitish caterpillars or moth-worms proceeding therefrom immediately begin to gnaw the substances within their reach and cover themselves with the fragments, shaping them into little hollow rolls and lining them with silk. Some pass the summer within their rolls—

That is, I suppose, go down to Long Branch, ride in free palace Pullman cars—

some carrying their cocoons about on their backs and others fastened to the substance they are eating; and they enlarge them from time to time by adding portions of the two upon extremities and by gores set in the sides, which they slit for this purpose. Concealed within their movable cases or in their lint cupboard burrows, they carry on the work of destruction through the summer—

That is when Congress is not in session—and in the autumn—

That is just before elections, [laughter]—

they leave off eating, make fast their habitations, and remain at rest and seemingly torpid through the winter.

That is until committees of investigation get to work. [Laughter.]

Early in the spring they change to chrysalids within their cases, and in about twenty days afterward they are transformed to winged moths, and come forth and fly about in the evening—

These are the defaulters who go off without being called to account by the Administration—till they have paired and are ready to lay their eggs.

Mr. FIELD. I insist upon my point of order. [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. COX. I will submit just one question. If I had the shorthand faculty of my friend from New York [Mr. MELLISH] I would put it into good shape. [Laughter.] I think it should be something like this: whether the moths which we are called upon to appropriate against—and whose incursions upon our Army clothes are so wasteful—are the moths of the more numerous branch of the Lepidoptera, or do they belong to the Phalæna family of Linnæus? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. To that question I answer in the affirmative. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. And have they a robust thorax, and if we apply snuff to them, instead of the expensive petroleum solution, will they not sneeze out the predatory thorax, so that we can thereby save $50,000 a year? [Laughter.]

But, sir, to be serious for a moment, and in conclusion. No man has suffered more than myself from the extraordinary essays on Saturday and other days, in Senate and House, at home and abroad, in pamphlet and press, upon the currency question. I believed I had mastered some of its abstruseness. I was sure at one time that inflation would carry. I saw the light of victory in the eye of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] Then I recalled the vicissitudes of politics. I read, reread, dreamed of bonds, notes, gold and silver, exchanges and convertibilities, until I was in despair. But to-day, sir, it is all clear. The solution of the financial problem is the moth. It is the Lepidopter. I feel it. Whether produced by the war or by bad administration, the causes are at once solved by considering the habits and results of the moth. Therefore, sir, I propound this interrogatory, as the final relief of our financial debates and worries; any gentleman of the ability of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] or my colleague [Mr. MELLISH] can answer:

Suppose that, in the event of the success of the bill of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] there was at once established an interconvertibility between the three sixty-fives which he proposes and the national-bank and greenback currency, [great laughter,] and in the processes of contraction the five-twenties would fall to par and the greenback retire for the national-bank notes, in consequence of the extraordinary resumption of our irredeemable debt last September by the Treasury, at five dollars apiece in silver quarters; and the imports should at once fall off several millions, while thus reciprocally affecting the export of pea-nuts from North Carolina, the hog-trade of Indiana, the hoop-pole trade of Ohio, and, indirectly, the clam trade of Cape Cod; and to such an appreciable extent that the German bankers, being in correspondence with the bulls of New York, should, by a sudden panic, create a demand for the Saginaw copper dollar-notes of Ishpeming, Michigan, quoted the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and thence would ensue a rush of bears who had possessed themselves of their own currency and invested it in the three sixty-fives; and the currency would then swell, and then shrink, and thus produce an elasticity that would move the crops, and induce such speculation that in one of the swells we should burst and in one of its shrinks we should collapse, would it so affect the Ashantee war and the expenses of Great Britain as to demoralize the Saginaw Mining Company, destroy the destructive influences of the Lepidopter moth, and thus stop an appropriation for the centennial of American Independence? [Great laughter.]

All these things should be considered. We expect that when a man like my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] addresses an intelligent House like this he should know all about these things. He is eminent, and exposed to the reproaches of politics. He should be able especially to tell us where all these uniforms and clothes are, and why it takes so much money to take care of them. He should run for governor of New York on the moth issue.

Mr. WHEELER. Here they are, [holding out a pamphlet.] The gentleman can take this home with him, and have his measure taken for one. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. If my friend will only print it in the RECORD, it will satisfy the people. Say what and laugh as we will, it is the truth, that there is clothing enough on hand now to save one-third of all the reserve that has been illegally issued from the Treasury; and we appropriate hundreds of thousands to save it from moths! God help the Government from moths!

Mr. WHEELER. I can take my friend in ten minutes to a shop where he can get the best suit in the lot. [Laughter.]

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order. [Great laughter.]

Mr. COX. Well; I will sit down. [Laughter.]

The question was upon the amendment moved by Mr. WHEELER, to strike out the words "heretofore adopted and now in use."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For Army contingencies, namely, such as are not provided for by other estimates, embracing all branches of the military service, $100,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended, directly or indirectly, for any use not strictly necessary for, and directly connected with, the military service of the Government.

That amendment, I think, explains itself, and will meet with no objection.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say a word. I do not rise particularly to oppose this amendment, but I want to know why $100,000 should be given for general contingencies. The Army has very remarkable ways of obtaining contingencies; so, indeed, have all the Departments or the Government. I hold in my hand a specimen. Two years ago, after making many efforts to get information as to what was done with the proceeds of property sold by the War Department on the 18th of March, 1872, the Secretary of War sent to this House a communication, which will be found in Executive Document No. 200, of the second session of the Forty-second Congress. In that document is a report from the Quartermaster-General's Department, about which so much has been said within the last few minutes. When called upon to tell how much property of the Government he had sold, the Quartermaster-General made this return:

The approximate amount received from sales during each fiscal year, from June 30, 1865, to the present time, is as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866	$28,442,457 01
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867	3,442,913 28
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868	5,538,822 47
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869	1,071,213 96
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870	1,039,264 96
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871	1,078,065 65
To March 11, 1872	2,346,679 31
Total	42,959,416 62

In addition to this, there were transferred to this Department from other Departments, under the acts of Congress of March 3, 1809, and August 31, 1852, the following amounts:

From the Subsistence Department, October 14, 1865	$25,000,000 00
From the Subsistence Department, October 31, 1865	15,000,000 00
From the appropriation for 100-day volunteers, October 31, 1865	10,000,000 00
By transfer appropriation warrant, 1867	15,000,000 00

Making the total amount received by this Department since June 30, 1865, in excess of its appropriations, $107,959,416.62. All of this has been used in payment of indebtedness of the Department, except, as before stated, the sum of $2,277,807.64.

All of this had been used in payment of the indebtedness of the Department except $2,277,000 as above stated. Now, when a Department can sell property and expend the proceeds to the extent of $105,000,000 in excess of appropriations, to pay what that Department calls its own indebtedness, I do not see much use for a contingency. This is the statement of the Quartermaster-General, that in excess of the appropriations which we have made he has spent in that time over $100,000,000.

Mr. WHEELER. Does my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] know that the law has been changed since that time, and that now the money is required to be paid directly into the Treasury?

Mr. BECK. I see that there is a section in this bill—section 3—which will accomplish that purpose; and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. WHEELER. That is as to old balances, most of which accrued before the act of 1870.

Mr. BECK. But can the gentleman tell me how it is that one Bureau alone of the War Department—the Quartermaster's—can manage to spend, in order to meet any contingency, $105,000,000 in excess of all appropriations; $5,000,000 more than it cost for all the expenses of the Government during the first twenty-one years of its existence? And yet complaint is made by my friend from New York [Mr. COX] that they are not selling off fast enough.

Mr. WHEELER. The general debate on this bill is closed; otherwise I could give the gentleman the information he asks. [Laughter.] I will only say that the committee are of opinion that these contingencies ought to be hedged up; and this proviso is introduced for that very purpose.

Mr. BECK. I think it a very good one.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WHEELER, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Army Medical Museum and medical and other necessary works for the library of the Surgeon-General's Office, $3,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "3," and inserting "10," so as to make the appropriation $10,000, which is the amount of the original estimate. The Surgeon-General informs me that so small an appropriation as that proposed is insufficient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the ordnance service, required to defray the current expenses at the arsenals; of receiving stores and issuing arms and other ordnance supplies; of police and office duties; of rents, tolls, fuel, and lights; of stationery and office furniture; of tools and instruments for use; of public animals, forage, and vehicles; incidental expenses of the ordnance service, including those attending practical trials and tests of ordnance, small-arms, and other ordnance supplies, $200,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend the clause just read by making the appropriation $125,000 instead of $200,000, and by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended, directly or indirectly, for any use not strictly necessary for, and directly connected with, the military service of the Government; and this restriction shall apply to the use of public animals, forage, and vehicles: And provided further, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the construction or repair of buildings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For manufacture of metallic ammunition for small-arms, $100,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend by striking out "100" and inserting "75," so as to make the amount of the appropriation $75.000. This motion is based upon returns made by the Ordnance Department since the preparation of the bill, which have satisfied the committee that, with the ammunition already on hand, an appropriation of $75,000 will be sufficient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For saddlers' tools, smiths' tools and materials, tool-bags, cavalry-forges, with their tools and materials for the cavalry service, $30,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend by striking out "30" and inserting "20," so as to make the amount of this appropriation $20,000. The articles named in this paragraph were formerly furnished by the Quartermaster's Department; but under a recent general order they are furnished by the Ordnance Department, to which, as appears by the last report of the Quartermaster-General, his Department turned over a large quantity of these articles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For infantry, cavalry, and artillery equipments, consisting of valises, haversacks, canteens, and great-coat straps, and for re-covering cavalry-saddles with leather, and for manufacture of saddle-bags, and repairing horse-equipments for cavalry troops, $125,000.

Mr. WHEELER. For the reasons stated by me in relation to the preceding paragraph, I move to amend this by striking out the words "and 25," so as to make the amount of the appropriation $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For manufacture of depressing carriages, $20,000.

Mr. STONE. I move to amend by striking out the clause just read. I make this motion in order to elicit from the gentleman having charge of this bill a statement as to the utility of appropriating $20,000 for the manufacture of depressing carriages. I do not believe that there is any necessity for such an appropriation. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] will give us some information.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not myself think that there is much necessity for this appropriation. I am willing the item should be struck out.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this paragraph will not be stricken out. These depressing carriages are gun-carriages of peculiar construction, designed for some parts of the more important of our sea-coast defenses. The guns at such points are liable, when in exposed positions, to be injured or destroyed if mounted upon ordinary carriages. By means of these depressing carriages the guns can have a free range while discharging, and after the discharge can be lowered at once to be in a safe position. By this means the effectiveness of the guns is largely increased. If a gun is fired from an inclosed space behind a covered work from a casemate, its range, of course, must be restricted; but by means of these depressing carriages the guns obtain a clear range all around, while when not actually being fired they can be protected from the fire of the enemy. This device is pronounced by competent engineer officers to be a most ingenious and useful improvement. If we are to rely upon the testimony of scientific men I can hardly conceive of a more important adjunct to our defensive works. We have expended very much greater sums on experiments with heavy guns; we are now engaged in such experiments; costly, it is true, but no doubt to result in knowledge of vast importance. I hope this will not be stricken out. It has the approval of scientific men of the highest character after thorough investigation, and we ought not to withhold a little sum of this kind for these works of defense upon the sea-board.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, while I do not question the efficiency of this process, I wish to say it is not the policy of the Committee on Appropriations to furnish money for much heavy armament for the next fiscal year; and this sum is so small it cannot effect any practical purpose. I trust, therefore, the amendment of the gentleman on my left to strike out will prevail.

Mr. STONE. If the gentleman will turn to page 70 of the Book of Estimates he will find this is an item which has been estimated for. It is for the manufacture of depressing carriages. Having been engaged in the manufacture of gun-carriages some time ago, I undertake to say the $20,000 which is appropriated in this bill will not pay for one-fourth of these gun-carriages, as suggested by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.] This item is but an entering-wedge, and before we get through with it we will find we will be called upon to spend millions of dollars for the manufacture of these depressing carriages for heavy guns. I do not think either the House or the country will agree there is any necessity demanding such an expenditure of the public money at this time.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Under the newly invented system the gun-carriage, after the piece has been fired, recoils, and the piece is then under cover and the men are under cover, and when run out into action again the men are still under cover.

These depressing carriages for guns are not entirely new. The old guns are only remodeled, and the cost of the alteration is comparatively small. From the testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs the expense amounts to but little.

Mr. POTTER. How many of these carriages will this appropriation supply?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I do not know; but I suppose it will supply all the heavy batteries of the sea-coast.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. O, no; it will not supply those even in New York Harbor.

Mr. STONE. The estimates say this is for the manufacture of depressing carriages; and this appropriation is for the manufacture, of depressing carriages. There is not the least mention of any alteration of the present gun-carriages.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It was so explained to us before the Military Committee, and I hope this appropriation will not be stricken out. I think this is one of the most important inventions of the Ordnance Department.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 30; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. STONE, and Mr. YOUNG of Georgia, as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The committee informally rose.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced to the House that that body had passed a concurrent resolution of the House, to raise a joint select committee, consisting of — Senators and five members of the House, to inquire into the contracts made for improvements in the District of Columbia, with an amendment in which he was requested to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. R. No. 87) to facilitate the execution of, and to protect, certain public works of improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River;

An act (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes; and

An act (S. No. 438) to withhold from sale the site of the old light-station at Nayatt Point.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For manufacture at national armories of the new model breech-loading musket and carbine, adopted for the military service on recommendation of the board of officers convened under act of June 6, 1872, $100,000.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, this money, $100,000, to be expended at national armories, would be expended in my district. I think it is the only appropriation which can possibly be made by Congress which will be expended in my district. I move to strike out the last word, to get some information in reference to it. The estimate is $500,000, and the committee have cut it down to $100,000. I am not going to stand here and antagonize with the Committee on Appropriations in any effort they are going to make at reduction simply because it comes in my own district.

What I desire is to ascertain from the committee certain facts in regard to the manufacture of arms at the Springfield armory. Last year there was appropriated $100,000. But there was an unexpended balance by which, with the $100,000 appropriated, work was continued at the armory. I am desirous of knowing whether this appropriation of $100,000 can be supplemented at all by any unexpended balance, so that the work can go on in the Springfield armory to the extent of keeping the workmen there. Beyond that I have no desire to interfere with this appropriation.

The work at the Springfield armory is a peculiar one, and unlike any other work carried on in the United States. The manufacture of the Springfield musket is the manufacture of an arm celebrated now throughout not only this country but the world. It is made up of sixty different parts. I have here a photograph of all the parts. They are manufactured according to an invention made at the Springfield armory, which has revolutionized not only all the work of manufacturing arms, but the work of making watches, sewing-machines, and all other machines of that character through the whole country. This is the method of making interchangeable parts. These parts as they appear upon this photograph are made precisely alike in thousands and hundreds of thousands of muskets; so that any musket that falls to pieces or is broken upon the battle-field, or suffers any damage anywhere else, can be repaired upon the battle-field or anywhere else if you can find another broken musket. Or you can order by letter to the Springfield armory a part or any number of those parts to fit in the repair of any musket, and they can be sent anywhere that the mail will reach. This is the invention of a man, now a poor old man, dependent upon charity for his support in the last years of his life. It was introduced at the Springfield armory, and not only revolutionized the work there, but was introduced into the manufacture of watches and every other kind of machinery that was susceptible of being made in interchangeable parts.

I speak of this for the sole purpose of calling attention to the fact that of the men thus employed each man devotes his whole life to the making of one part of a musket; and there are as many sets of men employed in that armory as there are parts of a musket, being, as I have said, sixty. They devote their whole life from boyhood to that work. They are, in the nature of the case, unfit for any other kind of work. If, therefore, there is not a sufficient appropriation here, with the unexpended balances, to keep those men at work upon the muskets, they will be turned adrift, unfitted for any other kind of work; they will be scattered all over the country; and the Government will be unable to gather them back into the works there at the time when it must have muskets manufactured. All I desire is, that this appropriation may be large enough, with the unexpended balances, to keep these men at work in the Springfield armory.

Before the war there was an annual appropriation of $250,000 for expenditures at the two armories of Harper's Ferry and Springfield.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the committee will allow me a few minutes more. The armory at Harper's Ferry is now discontinued. The armory at Rock Island has not yet got to making guns. The only manufacture of the Springfield musket in the country is at the Springfield armory.

Now, I have no desire to ask any extra appropriation for this armory; nor have I any desire to antagonize the committee in cutting down the estimates from $500,000 to $100,000, provided there is enough to keep these men at work. It would be not only a misfortune to the men to be thus turned adrift, but it would be a misfortune and a loss to the Government if they lost these men. They will be gathered up into Colt's Springfield factory, and into the Remington-rifle factory, and the result will be that, when they have got away from the Government, they will use the very inventions that originated in the Springfield armory in the private factories, and the Government will not be able afterward to command them. In behalf therefore of the Government, as well as of these men, I ask the committee to put this appropriation at such a point as, with the unexpended balances, will keep the men employed. That is all I ask in reference to the Springfield armory.

Mr. WHEELER. The Committee on Appropriations have fully appreciated the necessity of keeping at all times at the Springfield armory a band of skilled artisans, and have been governed solely by that necessity in fixing this amount at $100,000. The Secretary of War asked in his estimates for $500,000. The committee thought there was no call for that expenditure for the manufacture of arms. There is now on hand $150,000 of material at the Springfield armory. There is money sufficient to pay all the men now employed there for the balance of this fiscal year. And for the next fiscal year there will be not only this appropriation of $100,000, but the standing appropriation of $200,000 for arming and equipping the militia. Under these circumstances the committee believe that these appropriations will keep as many skilled men employed at the Springfield armory as the necessities of the country require.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend in line 177, after "1872," by inserting as follows:

And for arming the militia of all the States in accordance with existing law, and for altering the present muzzle-loaders, $400,000.

I may perhaps ask for an extension of time beyond the five minutes allowed me under the rule, in order that I may properly present this matter, which, in my judgment, is of very vital importance. I have hitherto forborne taking part in this debate, because I have been willing to allow the Committee on Appropriations to manage its own bills. As has been stated by the gentleman in charge of this bill, [Mr. WHEELER,] since 1808 there has been a permanent appropriation of $200,000 for arming and equipping the militia. That amount, $200,000, was appropriated when we had only eight million people. It was for all kinds of arms and equipments—for muskets, cartridge-boxes, sabers, belts, cannon, gun-carriages, and for every kind of ordnance stores distributed among the militia; therefore a very small portion of it goes into the manufacture of arms.

Two years ago, under a resolution of this House, the Ordnance Department appointed the ablest commission of officers that ever sat, and that commission sat for six months, going through a thorough examination of every possible musket, and every system of small-arms. They decided, after all their examination, that the Springfield musket, as improved at that armory, was the best possible breech-loading arm. Now, there have not been made more than five thousand of those arms.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Not so many as that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My friend says not so many as that have been made. That being now the standard arm of the United States, there are none to be had. Independent of the excellence of the arm, following the experience of the Prussian war, it has been found that a caliber of .45 of an inch is the best size of bullet for use. They have therefore reduced the bore of the gun to that size. It is to be fitted with metallic ammunition, and no ammunition that is now made will fit that gun except that which is being made at the Government manufactory.

That being so, we are in this condition: that unless we have these arms made we have no standard arms, and the militia will be, as they are being now, armed with all sorts of arms, of all sorts of caliber. My own State of Massachusetts has purchased six thousand arms of different caliber. New York has purchased, I think, twenty thousand of a still different caliber. Other States have purchased a large number of arms of various calibers. The consequence is that all these arms will be useless whenever they are brought together, and our troops will be precisely as were the troops on the battle-field of Bull Run, where two regiments could not fire a shot because there was different ammunition of different caliber served out to each.

Now, it is to avoid all that that we should begin this manufacture. It is very poor economy not to do it. The Springfield armory is capable of turning out five hundred guns a day. This present sum of $100,000, with all the balance of appropriations that may be left, will not enable them to turn out more than one hundred and fifteen guns a day, because, as this report shows, a gun costs sixteen dollars, and gentlemen can see how few can be made with that appropriation. Consequently it is a great want of economy to cut down this appropriation, for this reason: it costs just as much to light the armory, to warm it, to superintend it, and to furnish the power for it, with a small appropriation as with a large one, while all the other expenses are going on, when they are doing substantially nothing.

As the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] says, there is a large quantity of old material which might as well be worked up. That being so, the question is, shall we dispense with this body of skilled workmen and carry on our armory, when the cost of superintending, and lighting, and heating will make the gun cost twenty-five dollars; whereas if run on full time and full-handed a gun will cost only about sixteen dollars? It is a simple question of economy.

The Secretary of War asks for $500,000; that will give about 35,000 arms.

[Here the hammer fell.]

I ask that my time may be extended a few minutes. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read that which I have marked, from the annual report of the Ordnance Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

In this connection, as bearing most vitally upon the effectiveness of the armed force of the nation in time of war, the wants of the whole body of the militia is again presented for legislative action. The annual appropriation of $200,000 for arming and equipping the militia, fixed by the act of April 23, 1808, is entirely inadequate at the present time, with a population increased from eight to more than forty millions. As a consequence, some of the richer States of the Union have had to make appropriations of money to provide the arms, &c., necessary to supply such deficiency; although the intention of Congress, as expressed in the law of 1808, was that the money so appropriated should supply the "whole body of the militia." If $200,000 was not deemed too much in 1808, when arms, &c., were cheap as compared with the improved and costly mechanism now admitted to be a necessity, surely an increase of the appropriation to $1,000,000 is the least that is required to fully meet the wants of the "whole body of the militia," and carry out the expressed wishes of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, I desire to add a word or two more from the testimony of the General-in-Chief of the Army, General Sherman. He says, "You ought to have on hand two hundred thousand of the best possible muskets at all times." Again he says, in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY:] "The Springfield armory is very fine, and should always be kept in full operation on account of the Government." He also expresses a desire that all the smaller armories should be discontinued.

I want to add one word further: We have about one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand muzzle-loading arms that have gone wholly out of use. It is not a very costly matter to alter those arms; and when they are altered they are very good arms. Therefore I put in my amendment a provision that such portion of this appropriation as the Ordnance Department may think advisable may be used for altering the muzzle-loaders, and for supplying the wants of the States.

I wish to call attention to another fact. During the war, when States called for arms, we issued arms to them frequently in advance of their quota; so that a great many of the States cannot now get any arms, for the reason that they have already overdrawn their percentage. Hence they are obliged to buy such arms as they require. Now, they cannot buy them except from private manufacturers, and the guns purchased in this way will, of course, vary in caliber, so that they cannot be used when the troops are brought together.

Mr. MERRIAM. Is the gentleman aware that there is an armory in the United States competent to turn out thirteen hundred complete breech-loading arms every twenty-four hours, from the raw material of steel and wood, and that the London Times has said that the capacity of this establishment is greater than any in Great Britain?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am perfectly aware of the existence of the establishment of Remington & Sons, to which, I presume, the gentleman alludes.

Mr. MERRIAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I know, also, the capacity of that establishment; but I know, too, that they have a very large contract to supply arms abroad—enough to keep them running during the next fiscal year. They are making very good guns indeed, but the difficulty is, our Army, under the law of Congress, has adopted a standard of .05 of an inch less caliber than the Remington gun; and the ammunition for one style of gun will not suit the other any more than my hat would fit the head of my friend from New York.

Mr. MERRIAM. The ammunition is now made to fit.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand about the making of the ammunition; but if ammunition is made as big as my thumb it will not fit a muzzle that is only as big as my little finger. That is the difficulty. If we are going to discard that standard, be it so; if we are not going to discard that standard—and I think no one here will say that we ought not to sustain it—then we ought to keep this Springfield armory at work; and we cannot keep it at work unless we make a larger appropriation than is here proposed.

Besides, as I was about to say when interrupted, the States should be able to buy these arms from the Springfield armory; and then the body of our militia will all be armed alike. Many of the States will be obliged to do this—among them Massachusetts and New York and some of the Southern States. Some of the States in the far West have overdrawn their quota for the purpose of fighting the Indians; and they cannot get any more arms to enable their militia to co-operate with our Army unless the Government manufactures the arms; and they must be manufactured at the Springfield armory. Another difficulty is, that when our military force on the frontier is brought into connection with the militia, they cannot operate together, because they have two different kinds of ammunition.

Thanking the committee for giving me an opportunity to explain my views, I will, in conclusion, merely express the hope that this appropriation will be raised to $400,000, which is $100,000 less than the amount recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, as to so much of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as relates to the necessity of keeping a band of skilled artisans at Springfield, I fully agree with him. But as I said to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who sits nearest to me, we are giving the Springfield armory just what it has heretofore received and is getting for the current fiscal year—$300,000—which is ample.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How $300,000?

Mr. WHEELER. Two hundred thousand dollars which is a permanent appropriation for the manufacture of arms for the States, and the $100,000 which this bill gives.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; the $200,000 goes not only for small-arms, but for arms of every description.

Mr. WHEELER. I know that a very small portion of that appropriation has been deducted in times past for articles other than small-arms.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That appropriation covers all the cannon that we made for the use of the States.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Massachusetts would be right in the position he takes if this were the proper time for manufacturing a new arm for the entire country. But as to the policy of doing that, I take issue with him. It is true the Secretary of War recommended an appropriation of $500,000; and he made that recommendation with the view to the manufacture of a new arm; but he based his recommendation, not on the ground that this arm should be manufactured for distribution to the States, but that the country ought to have a reserve fund of arms. Now, taking into account the new arms already manufactured, and the money already appropriated for that purpose, the Army will at the end of the current fiscal year be provided with the new arm. So far as the regular Army is concerned, it will be so provided from appropriations already made.

Now, in addition to this, should we undertake the manufacture of this new arm for the militia? I say not: first, because the country is not now in a condition to afford the expenditure; and, secondly, because the appropriation asked for would not begin to accomplish the object. As the gentleman from Massachusetts said, a large number of States have already overdrawn their quota of arms. For instance, the State of California has overdrawn its quota to the amount of $186,000. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for uniformity of arms throughout the country. Is it to be presumed that in the present condition of the country the State of California is in a position to buy the new arm according to its proportion if the Government should engage in the manufacture of it? So with the State of Kansas, which has overdrawn its quota in the sum of $47,000; the State of Missouri, which has overdrawn to the amount of $674,000; the State of New York, to the amount of $22,000; the State of Ohio, to the amount of $122,000, and so on. Will these States, in the present condition of the country, come forward and pay for these arms? I think not; and consequently we cannot have any uniformity of new arms, particularly as the money will not supply enough of them.

But my answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts is this: Our armories are already groaning with the weight of accumulated arms. I will show you, on the authority of the Ordnance Bureau, what we have on hand. We have 1,058 Springfield carbines on hand to-day. We have 2,866 Sharps carbines on hand to-day. We have 988 Spencer carbines on hand. We have 6,930 of the Springfield muskets. We have 9,802 of the Remington muskets on hand. We have cartridges for the Springfield, Sharps, and Remington muskets and carbines, 5,141,350. We have cartridges on hand for Spencer carbines, 3,127,187. We have several hundred thousand new arms, muzzle-loaders, with necessary ammunition. We have quite enough of arms of new models and caliber, with all the ammunition attached, to meet any emergency of the country for the coming fiscal year. And I submit to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] this is not a time to embark in any new enterprise of this kind, when, as he knows, the model and caliber of these arms are changing from day to day and from year to year. If you make this appropriation, I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts the result will be, these arms when manufactured will be stored, and the next year we will be asked by the Ordnance Department for an appropriation of twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty thousand dollars for cleaning, preserving, and overhauling, which item meets us in the Army appropriation bill every year. I think my friend from Massachusetts will agree with me this is a time when we should let alone for a little while the manufacture of these small-arms.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will accede heartily to the request made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who has addressed the committee in regard to the proposed amendment. I have been more pleased than with anything which has occurred in this debate to hear the eloquent voice of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] raised upon this floor in behalf of the suffering mechanics in any section of this country, and I am none the less pleased because his conversion has only occurred when the appropriation to keep laboring men at work in this country has only reference to his own district. I hope the effect of his taking ground in behalf of making the necessary appropriations to keep skilled mechanics and laboring men to work in his own district will induce him to grant liberal appropriations hereafter to keep employed skilled artisans and laborers where they are now in the service of the Government in the interests of other sections of the country. I hope his interest in this class of men will not stop at the Springfield armory, but will continue, so that his generous heart will overflow from his own district to some other section of the country, where some appropriation is asked for to keep skilled labor at work. I shall heartily join hands with the gentleman from Massachusetts to have the largest sum necessary to keep his suffering laborers at work in the Springfield armory in his district, and I hope the gentleman will not forget it when I come to ask again, as I may have occasion to do, for some appropriation to keep the suffering laborers and skilled artisans at work in some other section of the country. I trust he will give his vote for such appropriation when it comes up for consideration. I heartly agree with the gentleman in his recommendation, and I will vote with him with pleasure; and I hope a large majority of the committee will vote in the same way.

Mr. DAWES. The amendment I proposed was a formal amendment. I ask no other rule for the Springfield armory than I propose to apply to every other public work. I have not asked to increase this appropriation for the Springfield armory. I shall endeavor to meet this question precisely as I will meet every other question. I will cut it down to the lowest possible point of public necessity. The line of my conduct here in reference to public expenditures is to be run between absolute necessity and every other expenditure whatever, and for that reason I omitted to ask to have this raised. I asked to have the committee state to this House whether they proposed to disband the Springfield armory and turn a class of skilled artisans who are educated in no other kind of employment loose, and then hereafter hunt over this country with a search-warrant to find them when our necessity comes. It is not because it is in my district, Mr. Chairman. No; I did not here undertake to increase any appropriation recommended by the Committee on Appropriations to be expended. When I do I will be open to the friendly criticism of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. PLATT,] but not till then. I knew quite well it would not do for me to ask this appropriation should be raised. I saw it notified all over the country when it came to the Springfield armory it would be cut down, and I would be taught by an application of my own medicine to myself how comfortable it was.

Sir, I welcome it. My constituents will welcome it. I am willing to go before them and say that the course I have taken in trying to run the line between necessity and everything else has cost them the $400,000 cut down here in this appropriation bill if need be, and to have my constituents pass upon that line of conduct of mine. If, sir, this Committee on Appropriations are disposed to turn those men loose, they will take the responsibility and not myself. If the Committee on Appropriations say that by means of this $100,000 and the $200,000 of permanent appropriation the work will be continued as before, that is all I ask.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. The gentleman talks about cutting down appropriations. Was not the appropriation for the present fiscal year just $100,000? The appropriation proposed now by the committee is the same appropriation as was made last year. There is no reduction at all about it.

Mr. DAWES. I am not complaining of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman said that the appropriation had been cut down $400,000.

Mr. DAWES. I spoke of the appropriations being cut down from the estimates.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The reduction of the Army, which my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] has been able to introduce so successfully into this bill, has met the applause of the entire country. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there is an apparent inconsistency in reducing the Army five thousand men, and at the same time increasing the arms of the country by an expenditure of $100,000, especially when my colleague has just told us that we have enough breech-loading arms on hand to supply at least thirty thousand soldiers—the full number in the employment of the Government to-day. I wish to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that we have on hand to-day, besides the breech-loaders, more than one million of Springfield muzzle-loading arms stowed away in the arsenals of the country, useless, and becoming less valuable every day, and for which we are called upon for an annual appropriation to clean and scour off the rust.

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for us to chain the inventive genius of our countrymen. An arm manufactured to-day will be obsolete and of little use five years hence. Yet now, when we have more than arms enough on hand to supply our Army, when we have more on hand than we know what to do with, we are called upon to increase them, and for what purpose? Simply to give employment to the constituents of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who has pleaded so feelingly for this appropriation "as the only one he shall ask for his district."

Mr. Chairman, in this country our private armories are worthy of our consideration. It is the glory of our country that we do not require standing armies. Sir, the great army of this Republic is scattered all over our land as it was in 1861, in workshops, on farms, in city and town; it stands ready if occasion requires, to respond to the call of country. Fortunately for our civilization the spirit of our people is neither savage nor warlike; it is only patriotic, and ready if need be. During the last war the Government armories were unable to supply one-tenth the immediate demands: private armories came to our relief and supplied the necessities of our Government. Millions of dollars were then put into buildings and machinery by private enterprise to supply the arms required by the citizen soldier. To-day these armories have no Government patronage whatever; they would be entirely shut up but for the foreign demand for arms. And I submit that it should be the policy of this Government to encourage its private armories as well as its public armories. The public armories, as the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has said, can only turn out five hundred arms a day, but one private armory in the district I have the honor to represent, the Remington armory at Ilion, New York, can turn out thirteen hundred completed breech-loading arms every twenty-four hours—as good an arm as is made in the world. Now, if the Government should ever require a very large supply of modern arms, is it not of as much importance to have that armory as prepared to respond to the necessity of the Government as it is to sustain the armory at Springfield, Massachusetts? Is there not the same necessity for there being skilled artisans at these private armories as for keeping them together in the public armory? How was it when the war broke out? They came from their workshops from all over the country, and were able in a few days to place the best arm in the hands of the soldier for that emergency.

Mr. Chairman, the private armories of this country do not come to these halls to-day asking you to appropriate money to enable them to manufacture arms for the Government now, but they do ask that when arms are not needed you shall not appropriate large sums of money to fill up arsenals, shutting out thereby all encouragement to keep themselves in readiness to supply arms in the future by an appropriation, as proposed in this paragraph. Then, too, in the present condition of the Treasury, I submit, as there is no occasion whatever for this expenditure of $100,000, that it is our duty to strike it from this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I think it will be useful to the Committee of the Whole to know what has been the history of this appropriation during the past few years. Last year we gave $150,000 for the manufacture of arms at the national arsenal in addition to the $200,000 appropriated by the acts of 1808 and 1816 for arming the national militia; in other words, during the last fiscal year there were $350,000 at the disposal of the Government for the manufacture of arms. The only reason why the Secretary of War has asked us for $500,000 this year is that given in his annual report, which I hold in my hand: that the Government, having settled upon what they regarded to be the best breech-loading arm, think it wise that we shall appropriate enough to get a supply sufficient to meet any contingency. He says:

> It is now a question of grave importance whether new arms of the accepted system shall not be made at once in sufficient quantities for a reserve supply in case of war, and to this end an appropriation of $500,000 has been asked for the next fiscal year for the manufacture, together with the materials now on hand, of about thirty-five thousand arms.

But for the possible contingency of war the Secretary of War would doubtless have asked for only $150,000, as was given last year. The Committee on Appropriations having listened to the suggestions of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and acknowledging their worth, and force, and value under this condition of things, and also recognizing the necessity of not turning out of our arsenals a skilled force, that cannot be picked up any day as you can pick up ordinary laborers, we did simply this: we reduced the appropriations made last year by the amount of 14 per cent. only. We propose simply to give an appropriation amounting to 14 per cent. less than was appropriated last year.

The Secretary of War says that he has already enough to arm the Army we now have, and 14 per cent. decrease in the appropriation is only about what we propose of reduction in all the expenditures of the Government. And if we are trying to make a general reduction of from 10 to 14 per cent. in all our expenditures, I should be ashamed if we were not willing to make at least that much reduction in the expense of manufacturing small-arms.

But I cannot by any means agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] that we shall strike out this appropriation altogether, and depend upon private armories for the manufacture of our guns. I believe we have now succeeded in producing the best small-arm in the world. I think, with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that it is probably the best small-arm in the world. But I wish to suggest to that gentleman, and to all who are thinking upon that subject, that this small-arm is of very recent construction; we have adopted it only within the last few months. Let us give it a preliminary trial with our regular Army. If after two or three years of test and actual experiment it still comes up to what the gentleman from Massachusetts and I both believe it will prove to be, then there will be ample time to put it into the hands of the national militia. I do not believe that it would be wise to make this large increase of appropriation in order to secure a supply of this new arm before we have fully and thoroughly tested it in actual practice.

By cutting down this appropriation $50,000 we will not turn out a single skilled artisan; we do not lose our grasp and control of the business of manufacturing our own arms, as we would by adopting the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.] We do not overstock our armories, as we would do under the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I hope, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole will stand by the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MERRIAM. The gentleman says he thinks that we to-day have the best arm in the world. Does he believe it will be the best five years from now?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know; and therefore I want to wait.

Mr. MERRIAM. If we have arms enough now to supply our twenty-five or thirty thousand soldiers, why expend a large amount to manufacture more?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I had no intention of disturbing the industry either of the district of my colleague [Mr. DAWES] or the district of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.] I rejoice to know that in the case of my colleague the armory there is working full, besides making sewing-machines. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I want to say——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Do not take my time.

Mr. DAWES. I will not take your time. I wish to say that I do not suppose my colleague had any such intention. It would be of great advantage to my district to have the amendment of my colleague adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not care whether it is an advantage to his district or not. I have no interest whatever in that district. [Laughter.] I am attempting to advance the interests of the United States, and if I can get this committee to understand a fact which the Committee on Appropriations do not understand, I shall have no difficulty.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] tells us two things: first, that there was appropriated last year $150,000 to make arms; and that our present system of arms has been adopted only a few months. Why, sir, he knew, or ought to have known, that there was this limitation put on that appropriation, and the appropriation has not yet been expended, only a part in making experiments. The appropriation last year was as follows:

For manufacture of arms at the national armory, $150,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended until a breech-loading system for muskets and carbines shall have been adopted for the military service upon the recommendation of the board to be appointed by the Secretary of War, which board shall consist of not less than five officers, as follows: One general officer, one ordnance officer, and three officers of the line, one to be taken from the cavalry, one from the infantry, and one from the artillery: And provided further, That the system, when so adopted, shall be the only one to be used by the Ordnance Department in the manufacture of muskets and carbines for the military service; and no royalty shall be paid by the Government of the United States for the use of said patent to any of its officers or employés, or for any patent in which said officers or employés may be directly or indirectly interested.

Now there have been no new arms of that pattern made. And when gentlemen get up here and say there are seven hundred thousand Springfield muskets on hand, in my judgment they either betray their ignorance of the subject, or else they desire to deceive the House.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman hear a letter read——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I know where the gentleman got those letters; I took them myself to the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman never saw this letter.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The paper was handed to the committee, and the gentleman told me the committee never had a meeting afterward.

Mr. WHEELER. This letter was handed to me by the Ordnance Department, and it never has been out of my possession.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. All right; I knew where the shaft came from that was shot at me; I furnished it.

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me again state the difficulty. There are seven hundred thousand muzzle-loaders, which take paper ammunition; and they are now of no more use than one of last year's robins' nests. [Laughter.] Look at your statistics, and you will find that thirty-three out of every hundred men wounded in the war were wounded in the right arm. Why? Because they stood behind the parapets and had to throw up their arms to ram home the cartridges. To meet this difficulty all the nations of the earth are adopting a system of breech-loading guns, so that a man under a parapet can load his piece without exposing himself. Especially is it necessary in Indian warfare that your men acting as sharp-shooters should not be obliged to throw up their right arms to be shot at. It was in pursuance of this system of breech-loading arms that we passed the law of last year. Now, when we come to put that law into effect, and an insufficient appropriation is proposed, we are told that it will not cut off the armory. I know it will not, because the armory has been cut off already. It has been reduced as low as it possibly can be if it is to be kept up at all.

The gentleman from New York talks about the war reserve. Why, sir, $500,000 will only pay for thirty-five thousand muskets, hardly enough for your regular Army.

Mr. WHEELER. If that is so, how far will $400,000 go toward arming the whole militia of the country?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree it will not go a great ways; but it will go further than nothing at all. How far will no appropriation at all go? [Laughter.]

The States now cannot get good guns from the national armory, because we have not got them. There are not five thousand on hand. And yet we are told that this appropriation recommended by the Secretary of War is designed for the making of a "war reserve."

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the language of the Secretary of War—not mine.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; the Secretary of War spoke merely of making a beginning. You must begin somewhere. Now, sir, I am not legislating here, and by the blessing of God I never will legislate as though this country were in bankruptcy, as though we could not do anything but pinch here and starve there. We are not in that condition, thank God; if we were, the last thing I would do would be to turn out of employment the poor workmen engaged by the Government. [Applause in the galleries.] I would not put them in such a position that they would have nothing to do but to come into our galleries and hear our stupid debates. [Laughter.] I would not do that; and I hope this House will not. I want to legislate as a statesman. I will never undertake to build up a reputation as a statesman by starving some poor woman or by turning some poor man out of employment. I do not want any reputation which such a course might give me with my constituents.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say only a few words in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If you reply to my argument, then we shall be even.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not understand that we have any account to settle.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not at all.

Mr. WHEELER. We are the best friends in the world.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, yes; but I wish you were a still better friend. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. As to so much of the gentleman's argument as relates to turning poor workmen out of employment, I will only say that we do not interfere at all with the force in any of the armories. In this respect we leave them precisely as they are.

I wish to repel one statement of my friend from Massachusetts, which I know he would not have made except in the heat of debate. In the first place, he came before the Committee on Appropriations and left with us certain papers for the consideration of the committee. He will agree with me that I had the full right to use those papers in debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WHEELER. They were left for public, not private, use.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WHEELER. But I disclaim hurling the gentleman's own shaft at him. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from a letter which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 9, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry of to-day, I have the honor to inform you that the number of arsenals is twenty-one, and the number of men employed thereat, exclusive of the enlisted force, is 1,678. The new breech-loading arms and ammunition on hand in the arsenals are as follows, namely:

Springfield carbines, 1,058; Sharps carbines, 2,866; Spencer carbines, 988; Springfield muskets, 6,930; Remington muskets, 9,802.

Cartridges for Springfield, Sharps, and Remington muskets and carbines, 5,141,350; cartridges for Spencer carbines, 3,127,187.

We have several hundred thousand new arms, muzzle-loaders, with necessary ammunition.

* * * * * * *

By order of Chief of Ordnance:

Respectfully, your obedient servant.

S. V. BENÉT.
Major of Ordnance.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WHEELER. We have this immense stock of arms on hand after supplying the Army, on the basis of thirty thousand men, with the new arm. There I leave the subject.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to submit an amendment; and my object in doing so——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted, and no further amendment is in order. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out lines 174 to 178, as follows:

For manufacture at national armories of the new model breech-loading musket and carbine, adopted for the military service on recommendation of the board of officers convened under act of June 6, 1872, $100,000.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to a question of order. Should not the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which is designed to perfect the paragraph, be put before the motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The Chair did not understand that the whole paragraph was proposed to be struck out by the amendment of the gentleman from New York, for the reason that he had not sent it to the desk.

Mr. O'NEILL. I rise to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. WHEELER. I rise to a point of order. All motions to amend take precedence of a motion to strike out. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] may be allowed to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] if he has an amendment to offer perfecting the section.

Mr. O'NEILL. With a desire of perfecting the section, or rather the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and with a view of sustaining the entire consistency of the Committee of the Whole as well as that of the Committee on Appropriations, I feel very much inclined, if I find the gentleman's amendment should prevail, to suggest that there also be made up sufficient clothing to supply the militia of the States, and have it stored away for future use in the arsenals of the Government. Now, if you are going to have an increase this year, as the gentleman desires, of appropriation for the manufacture of arms for the militia of the States, it will be equally consistent should we prepare uniforms to be called for by the governors of the States if wanted, so that our militia should be uniformed alike if ever called into the service of the Government. We have an institution in Philadelphia—excuse me for referring to a locality, for I, like every other gentleman in the committee, desire to legislate for the country and not merely for a locality—we have there a Government establishment, the great clothing arsenal, in which the clothing for the Army has been made up for many years, and I am sorry to say at this day—and in that regard I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts in his idea that we should rather keep on with work—the men and women engaged in cutting out and making up that clothing have been discharged on account of the exhaustion of current appropriations in these very disastrous times. I think with equal consistency we can ask for $1,500,000 to make up this clothing; and I shall feel it my duty, if the gentleman's amendment carries, to offer such an amendment. For there is no reason on earth why, if we increase the appropriation for the manufacture of arms to supply the militia, we should not increase the appropriation for supplying them with clothing; and, Mr. Chairman, if that is to be done at all there is no better time to do it than now, so as to give work to the thousands of poor women who have been discharged in mid-winter, some of them and their families to suffer from want.

This institution has been established in Philadelphia since the war of 1812 with Great Britain; and during the late war of the rebellion there were some six or eight thousand women employed there, and hundreds of men, in making uniforms. Now, disregarding the question of locality, and looking to the interests of the whole country, but anxious to see plenty of work for the skilled men and women of Philadelphia who know how to do it, I ask, if the gentleman from Massachusetts succeeds, that a full force may be employed at the Schuylkill arsenal, so that plenty of clothing may be ready upon call from the governors of States, should emergencies demand the use of it. If we want guns we want clothing.

I ask the Clerk to read my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And for making clothing at the Schuylkill arsenal for the militia of the different States, and to be charged against the respective States when drawn, $1,500,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, as I am asked to answer that, I will; but prior to that I desire to have it understood, for I do not think the House yet understands it, that the arms to which the letter of the Secretary refers are muzzle-loading arms altogether. Does my friend agree with me?

Mr. WHEELER. Except about eighteen thousand guns.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not expect to arm all the militia out of $400,000. It took us from 1808 to 1850, with $200,000 appropriated every year, to begin to arm our militia up to the late war of the rebellion. All that has been swept away; and I am now asking simply there shall be arms so the border States can get them of good quality to repel Indian invasions.

Mr. COBURN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. COBURN. If the gentlemen will withdraw his amendment I will renew it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I withdraw it.

Mr. COBURN. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if I supposed we would be soon involved in war I would be in favor of much larger appropriations for small-arms than we have now proposed. I have no doubt we would require very large appropriations for the manufacture of these new and improved arms; but if we have no war, if we have a continued term of peace, as we likely will have, we will be sorry we have made these large appropriations. I am not in favor of taking extreme ground either way. I would not make a parsimonious allowance for the manufacture of the improved small-arms, and I would not make as large a one as that proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

I believe he proposes to manufacture too large a supply of these guns. In the first place there has been no branch of manufacture in which there have been greater improvements in the last few years than in that of small-arms. In no single article made by the hand of man has there been greater progress. And human ingenuity is not yet exhausted in this branch of labor and production. We are to have greatly improved arms upon the present pattern.

I believe that the musket of the future is not this breech-loading Springfield arm. I believe it will be a magazine gun, in which the load, or rather loads, are put into the stock, and perhaps from ten to thirty cartridges at one time. I have seen one that carried a hundred. These guns are being introduced in other nations besides our own. And to manufacture an immense number of arms which, like the muzzle-loading Springfield gun, must be thrown away in a few years, would be extreme folly. Therefore I say it is bad policy to manufacture a great supply.

Why, sir, when the late war broke out, only twelve or thirteen years ago, what was the kind of guns our men had in their hands? The old flint-lock altered to a smooth-bore percussion gun, others in addition being rifled for an immense cartridge of .69. Before the war was over we had what was then considered the best small-arm in the world, and was in fact without a rival in any army—these muzzle-loading Springfield rifles. Since the war was over we have progressed more than we did during the war; we have now the finest breech-loaders; and I see no reason why we should not progress just as much in the future.

Now, I hold it to be good policy not to manufacture so many more arms, but to increase the capacity for manufacturing arms. I would have plenty of machinery on hand, ready, in case of emergency, to turn out large numbers of arms on short notice. We are now pursuing that policy. We are erecting an immense arsenal. We have already, it is said, built, in a large measure, the most complete arsenal and armory in the world, at Rock Island. Let us go on in that direction, and perfect our armory at Rock Island, so that we may be able there to turn out as large a number or a larger number than we can at Springfield. That is the true policy. If we have any extra money to spend in this line, let us spend it on the best machinery to make arms, and not on arms themselves. Such machinery can easily be adjusted to the improvements in arms, and thus, on an emergency, they can be multiplied in great numbers upon the most approved pattern.

Mr. O'NEILL. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I renew it, for the purpose of saying a word or two.

I wish to correct the misapprehension which some gentlemen here seem to labor under as to the mechanical possibilities of the case. Some say, why not leave the work to private armories? They tell us we have armories that can turn out a thousand arms a day. Now mark this. The people of the Remington armory could not make Springfield breech-loaders of the new pattern, to save their lives, under six months; because, in the first place, they would have to go to work and make the requisite machinery. But if you made a contract with the Remington armory to manufacture and keep on hand ready for use the requisite machines, then at a few days' notice it could begin to turn out rifles at any required rate—five hundred or a thousand a day. But as it is, if you should wish to arm your troops in case of an emergency with this, which we suppose to be the best arm yet made, you could not do it. It is only at the Springfield armory that you have the requisite machinery; you have very few on hand, and the armory could not well supply you faster than say five hundred a day.

The true policy is to arm the country with the best arm that can be made. Yet I understand that you have not on hand ten thousand of the only arm we should rely upon. You have a large quantity of Springfield muzzle-loaders. Better sell these to such countries as are willing to take them, and make arms with which you can compete with the best made anywhere. Unless you do this, if you go to war with any other power you will be at as great a disadvantage with your muzzle-loaders against their breech-loaders as you would have been forty years ago with the old flint-lock smooth-bore against Springfield muzzle-loading rifles. The Springfield muzzle-loading rifle was an excellent weapon in its day, but the day is past. Wars will be conducted with breech-loaders hereafter; and every military authority will, of course, bear me out in this.

It would be feasible to contract with private armories, such as Remington's and Colt's, and a few others, to have proper machinery ready to set at work at a week's notice in case of threatened war, and, in conjunction with the Springfield armory, turn out several thousand rifles a day. But for the present it would seem wisest to let the Springfield armory go on, (if this is really a good weapon which the board has adopted,) and supply your Army, and put up a large reserve, selling off the old patterns as fast as the new ones were ready to take their places. If it is worth while to prepare at all, let us dispense with the antiquated muzzle-loaders. For the world will fight with breech-loaders, and none other, hereafter. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 178, "$100,000," and insert in lieu thereof the words "and for arming the militia of all the States, in accordance with existing law, and for alteration of the present muzzle-loaders, $400,000."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 120.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I have an amendment which I desire to offer, and which I think the committee will consent to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I trust the gentleman will permit the committee now to rise.

Mr. DAWES. After this. I move to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended at said armories in the perfection of patentable inventions in the manufacture of arms by officers of the Army otherwise compensated for their services to the United States.

A single word in explanation. It has been the custom of officers of the Army, who have a patentable idea which they think of great value, to go to the Springfield armory and avail themselves of the facilities there, at the expense of the Government, in perfecting a patent, and then the Government is obliged to pay them for the use of that patent, while civilians have to perfect their own patents at their own expense. It does not seem right, when the Army officer is paid for his services a regular salary, that he should have facilities furnished him at the expense of the Government, and get detailed to the Springfield armory, or other armory, to perfect a patent which he intends afterward to avail himself of when used by the Government of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. I see no objection to that amendment, and hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] yesterday moved an amendment which, at the suggestion of his colleague, [Mr. WHEELER,] he deferred offering until at the end of this section. That amendment will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no money greater in amount than that which is specifically appropriated shall for any purpose be expended in the public service by any officer of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make the point of order upon this amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

The next question was upon the motion of Mr. MERRIAM to strike out the paragraph as amended; and the question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BANNING. I move to amend the section by adding the following:

Provided, That no money herein appropriated shall be used or expended for recruiting service when the Army has a numerical force of twenty thousand, nor to increase the Army to exceed that number of troops; nor shall any money herein appropriated be used to pay the salary of any newly appointed officer, until the number of officers is reduced to a less number than is required by law to command twenty thousand troops properly organized.

Mr. WHEELER. I raise the point of order, that the amendment proposed is not germane to the pending paragraph, and it also involves new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HERNDON. I move to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That the President of the United States be authorized to receive into the service of the United States one regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, to be raised and organized by the State of Texas for the defense and protection of the frontier thereof; to continue in service from the time the whole regiment may be mustered into service for the term of eighteen months, unless sooner discharged by the President. Said regiment shall be composed of one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, one major, one adjutant with the rank of first lieutenant, one quartermaster and commissary with similar rank, one surgeon and two assistant surgeons, one sergeant-major, one quartermaster and commissary sergeant, and ten companies, each of which shall be composed of one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, four sergeants, four corporals, two buglers, one farrier, and seventy-four privates. Each of said officers below the rank of major, non-commissioned officers, musicians, farriers, and privates shall furnish and keep himself supplied with a good, serviceable horse and horse equipments, for the use and risk of which, in addition to the pay and allowances herein provided, he shall receive forty cents a day while in service with his horse; and if any non-commissioned officer, musician, farrier, or private shall, from carelessness or neglect, injure or render his horse unfit for service, and shall fail to supply a serviceable horse within the period of ten days from the loss, such soldier shall from such time until he shall furnish himself with a horse be entitled only to the pay of a private of infantry: And provided further, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, farriers, and privates of said regiment shall, when mustered into the service of the United States, be subject to the Rules and Articles of War. They shall be armed at the expense of the United States, as the President shall direct. They shall be allowed the same pay, rations, and allowances in kind, including clothing, and be subject to the same rules and regulations as are provided for the regiments of cavalry now in the service; but no field officer shall receive forage for a greater number of horses than he may from time to time actually have in service. No pay or allowances shall be due until said regiment shall be received into the service, but each officer and man shall then be entitled to one day's pay and allowance for every twenty miles he may have been required to travel from his residence to the place of muster. And the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated for the subsistence and pay of said regiment when mustered into service.

Mr. WHEELER. I raise the point of order that this amendment also involves new legislation,

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of War, in the expenditure of any money appropriated by this bill, where the Pacific Railroads or any of their branches, in any case where the Government retains the amount charged for its business on account of advances made to such railroads or either of them, come into competition with any other line of transportation, in deciding which line of transportation is the lowest bidder, shall consider all the money to be paid to the said Pacific Railroads or their branches as so much saved to the Treasury, and govern the transportation of men and supplies accordingly.

Mr. WHEELER. I know that the gentleman obtained a suspension of the rules so that this amendment might be in order to this bill. But I ask him to withhold it until the end of the bill is reached.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I will withdraw it with the understanding that it can then be offered.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLOGG reported that, in pursuance of the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being House bill No. 1009, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DIPLOMATIC SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1766) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular system of the United States," approved August 18, 1856, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That will be the understanding.

CLAIMS AGAINST CHILI.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House copies of all papers on file in the Department of State in reference to claims of citizens of the United States against the republic of Chili.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has not that information been already communicated in some published document?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It has not.

No objection was made, and the resolution was adopted.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 216) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Fearless; and

An act (H. R. No. 1754) to amend the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Amos Farling," approved February 5, 1873.

Mr. BECK. I move that the House now take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873." The pending question is on an amendment to section 1143, which was pending at the adjournment last evening.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend by striking out "13" and inserting "16," so that the section will read thus:

SEC. 1143. The Subsistence Department of the Army shall consist of one Commissary-General of Subsistence, with the rank of brigadier-general; two assistant commissary-generals of subsistence, with the rank of colonel of cavalry; two assistant commissary-generals of subsistence, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry; eight commissaries of subsistence, with the rank of major of cavalry; and sixteen commissaries of subsistence, with the rank of captain of cavalry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next section to which I wish to offer an amendment is section 1149.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1149. Each ration shall consist of one pound and a quarter of beef or three-quarters of a pound of pork, eighteen ounces of bread or flour, and at the rate of ten pounds of coffee, fifteen pounds of sugar, two quarts of salt, four quarts of vinegar, four ounces of pepper, four pounds of soap, and one pound and a half of candles to every hundred rations.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend this section by inserting what is found in the eighth section of the act of April 4, 1818, Statutes at Large, volume 3, page 427, as follows:

The President may make such alterations in the component parts of the ration as a due regard to the health and comfort of the Army and economy may require.

The Army ration is fixed in Durant's revision, sections 1149 and 1150, and in the commissioners' revision, page 594, section 52, and by reference to volume 12 of the Statutes at Large, page 744. The Navy ration is fixed by sections 1580 and 1581 of Durant's revision.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to move an amendment to section 1160.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1160. The enlisted men of the Engineer battalion shall perform the duties of sappers, miners, and pontoniers, and shall aid in giving practical instruction in those branches at the Military Academy. They may be detailed by the Chief of Engineers to oversee and aid laborers upon fortifications and other works in charge of the Engineer Corps, and, as fort-keepers, to protect and repair finished fortifications.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend, by inserting after the word "shall," in the first line of the section, the words, "be instructed in and." This provision is taken from the act approved May 15, 1846, chapter 21, section 4, of the Statutes at Large.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We have received from the War Department the following memorandum as to a supposed omission:

There is entirely omitted the provisions of the act of May 15, 1846, chapter 21, section 4, and the act of August 6, 1861, chapter 58, section 2, as follows:

"That the battalion of Engineers shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War; shall be recruited in the same manner and with the same limitation, and shall be entitled to the same provisions, allowances, and benefits, in every respect, as are allowed to the other troops constituting the present military peace establishment."

The committee are of opinion that this provision is properly omitted, because it is covered by general provisions. The section subjects certain branches of the Army to the Rules and Articles of war; but as the Rules and Articles of War are applicable to the whole Army, we deem it unnecessary in this revision to include that section.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment to section 1162.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1162. The Ordnance Department of the Army shall consist of one Chief of Ordnance, with the rank of brigadier-general, two colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, nine majors, fifteen captains, thirteen first lieutenants, eight second lieutenants, and eleven ordnance store-keepers. The ordnance store-keeper at Springfield armory shall have the rank of major of cavalry. All other ordnance store-keepers shall have the rank of captain of cavalry.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend this section by striking out "two," before the word "colonels," and inserting "three;" by striking out "two," before "lieutenant-colonels," and inserting "four;" by striking out "nine," before "majors," and inserting "ten;" by striking out "fifteen," before "captains," and inserting "twenty;" by striking out "thirteen," before "first lieutenants," and inserting "sixteen;" by striking out "eight," before "second lieutenants," and inserting "ten;" by striking out "eleven," before "ordnance store-keepers," and inserting "thirteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move in section 1166, line 3, to strike out the word "artificers," and insert "privates of the first class." This is the word used in the statutes, but the War Department advised us to insert "enlisted men." The section as amended will read as follows:

SEC. 1166. The Chief of Ordnance, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, shall organize and detail to regiments, corps, or garrisons, such numbers of privates of the first class, furnished with proper tools, carriages, and apparatus, as may be necessary, and shall make regulations for their government.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move on page 266, section 1164, after the word "arsenals," in line 3, to strike out these words:

The ordnance store-keeper and paymester at the national armory at Springfield shall have the rank of major of cavalry, and all other store-keepers shall have the rank of captain of cavalry.

So it will read:

SEC. 1164. Any number, not exceeding six, of the ordnance store-keepers may be authorized to act as paymasters at armories and arsenals.

The reason for this is that it is a duplicate of section 1162.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 1163, as follows:

SEC. 1163. No officer of the Army shall be commissioned as an ordnance officer until he shall have been examined and approved by a board of not less than three ordnance officers senior to him in rank. If an officer of the Army fail on such examination he shall be suspended from appointment for one year, when he may be re-examined before a like board. In case of failure on such re-examination he shall not be commissioned as an ordnance officer.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will state in reference to section 1163 the War Department called the attention of the committee to section 4 of an act approved March 3, 1863, chapter 81, which provides that "no officer of other regiments or corps of the Army shall be transferred and commissioned as an ordnance officer until," &c.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order when there is no propositon pending before the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move on page 267, section 1170, in line 3, to strike out "artificers and laborers," and insert "and enlisted men;" so that it will read:

SEC. 1170. The Chief of Ordnance shall half yearly, or oftener if so directed, make a report to the Secretary of War of all the officers and enlisted men in his department of the service, and of all ordnance and ordnance stores under his control.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move on page 267, section 1171, the following amendments:

Strike out "three" in line 4, and insert "four;" in line 5 strike out "fifty-five" and insert "sixty;" in line 6 strike out "ninety-four" and insert "one hundred and fifty;" and in line 9 strike out "four" and insert "five;" so that it will read:

SEC. 1171. The Medical Department of the Army shall consist of one Surgeon-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; one assistant surgeon-general, with the rank of colonel of cavalry; one chief medical purveyor and four assistant medical purveyors, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry; sixty surgeons, with the rank of major of cavalry; one hundred and fifty assistant surgeons, with the rank of lieutenant of cavalry for the first three years of service, and the rank of captain of cavalry after three years of service; and five medical store-keepers, with the rank of captain of cavalry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move at the end of the section to add these words, taken from the act of July 25, 1866, chapter 99, section 17:

All the original vacancies in the grade of assistant surgeon shall be filled by selection by examination from among the persons who have served as staff and regimental surgeons or assistant surgeons of volunteers in the Army of the United States during the late war.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move on page 267, section 1173, lines 2 and 3, to strike out the words "have the rank," and insert "be eligible for promotion to the grade;" so it will read:

SEC. 1173. Assistant surgeons who have served three years as surgeons or assistant surgeons in the volunteer forces shall be eligible for promotion to the grade of captain.

That is founded on section 5 of the act of March 7, 1867, chapter 145, fourteenth volume of the Statutes at Large.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move on page 267 to strike out section 1176, which is as follows:

SEC. 1176. Medical purveyors shall be charged, under the direction of the Surgeon-General, with the purchase of the medical supplies, books, instruments, hospital stores, and furniture, and of other articles required for the sick and wounded of the Army.

That is drawn from the act of April 16, 1862, 12 Statutes at Large, page 379, section 5, which has expired.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move on pages 267 and 268 to strike out section 1179, which is as follows:

SEC. 1179. The Surgeon-General shall, under the direction of the Secretary of War, be charged with the care and management of the Army Medical Museum, and with the care of the records of the Surgeon-General's office deposited in said building.

That rests on an appropriation, as will be seen by reference to volume 1 of the commissioners' revision, page 601, section 805.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. Why is that struck out? It is the question raised the other evening. The gentleman now making these amendments claimed this was a revision, and it was not intended to repeal any law. While I do not take issue with him, I do not see why this provision should not be retained.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is not in the statutes now.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I understand it is.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Those words are not in the statutes. This section 1139 is a mere supplementary provision which was inserted by the commissioners under the authority conferred upon them. Durant adopted it, supposing it was found in some existing statute, but it is not.

Mr. POLAND. The statute which is referred to is, I think, a mere appropriation of a certain sum of money, $100,000, to purchase Ford's Theater in this city for the Medical Museum. There is nothing in the statute which provides that it should be under the guardianship of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That provision, as reported by the commissioners, was properly inserted under the authority which they had.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment comes in on page 267, after section 1178. The sections which I propose to add are taken from the seventeenth volume of the Statutes.

I move to amend, by adding the following sections, to be inserted after section 1178:

SEC. —. Every soldier of the Union Army who was ruptured in the service is entitled to receive a single or double truss, of such style as may be designated by the Surgeon-General as best suited for his disability.

SEC. —. Application for such truss shall be made by the ruptured soldier to an examining surgeon for pensions, whose duty it shall be to examine the applicant, and when he is found to have a rupture or hernia, to prepare or forward to the Surgeon-General an application for such truss, without charge to such soldier.

SEC. —. The Surgeon-General is authorized and directed to purchase the trusses required for such soldiers at wholesale prices, and the cost of the same shall be paid on a requisition of the Surgeon-General, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move that there be a call of the House. It is very evident that there is no quorum present.

Mr. POLAND. I hope my friend from Tennessee will not insist upon that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Will the Chair inform me why the motion is not in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is only in order when a quorum is not present; and the absence of a quorum can only be ascertained by a count of the House on some question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I am not particular about it. But after the flourish we had last night, I see that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] is not in his seat, and for his benefit I think we ought to have a call of the House. I will withdraw the motion, however.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. So I get it in the RECORD, that is all I want. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. My next amendment is on page 267, section 1176. I move to strike out that section and to insert what I send to the desk.

Mr. POLAND. I wish to offer a word of explanation as to the sections which have been adopted in regard to trusses. The commissioners left out those sections with the idea that the provision of law they contained was a temporary one and had already fulfilled its mission. But the committee thought that there might be cases where parties were entitled to trusses and had not yet been supplied, and that the provision therefore should not have been dropped out of the statutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] are in order with regard to an amendment which has already been adopted by the House, unless the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Vermont moves to reconsider that vote.

The Chair will also state that the section referred to in the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Ohio has already been struck out. The gentleman's motion, therefore, will be merely to insert.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to insert the following after section 1175:

The chief medical purveyor shall have, under the direction of the Surgeon-General, supervision of the purchase and distribution of the hospital and medical supplies.

I will merely state that that amendment is founded on the act of March 3, 1873, United States Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 546.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My next amendment is in section 1183, page 268.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1183. The Pay Department of the Army shall consist of one Paymaster-General, with the rank of colonel; three assistant paymaster-generals, with the rank of colonel of cavalry; and forty-seven paymasters, with the rank of major of cavalry.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The rank of colonel for the Paymaster is indicated by the act of 4th June, 1872, Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 219. I offer the following amendment:

In line 2, strike out "three," and insert "two; in line 3 after the word "cavalry," insert "two deputy paymaster-generals, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry;" in line 3, strike out "forty-seven," and insert "sixty."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is in section 1193, page 269.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1193. All disbursing officers of the Paymaster's Department shall renew their bonds, or furnish additional security, at least once in four years, and as much oftener as the President may direct.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1, strike out the word "paymasters," and insert the word "pay;" so it will read, "all disbursing officers of the Pay Department," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment will come in after section 1224, page 272.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1224. Officers of the Army on the active list shall not be separated from their regiments or corps for employment on civil works of internal improvement, nor be allowed to engage in the service of incorporated companies.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of section 1224 add the following:

Nor be employed as acting paymaster or disbursing agent of the Indian Department, if such extra employment require that he be separated from his regiment or his company, or otherwise interfere with the performance of his military duties proper.

In explanation of this amendment I will state that the twenty-fifth section of the act of July 5, 1838, fifth Statutes, page 259, is section 1185, page 268, of Mr. Durant's revision; and the thirty-first section of the same act is in part in section 1224, page 292, Mr. Durant's revision. But there should be added at the end of section 1224 the words which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, because they are found in the said section of the act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to insert in line 1 of section 1208, after the words "Corps of Engineers," the words, "or of the Ordnance Department," so that it will read:

When any lieutenant of the Corps of Engineers or of the Ordnance Department has served fourteen years' continuous service as lieutenant, he shall be promoted to the rank of captain on passing the examination provided by the preceding section, but such promotion shall not authorize an appointment to fill any vacancy when such appointment would increase the whole number of officers in the corps beyond the number fixed by law; nor shall any officer be promoted before officers of the same grade who rank him in his corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend further by inserting, as a new section, after section 1223, the following:

SEC. —. Any officer of the Army who accepts or holds any appointment in the diplomatic or consular service of the Government shall be considered as having resigned his place in the Army, and it shall be filled as a vacancy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to insert after section 1225 the following:

The Secretary of War is authorized to issue, at his discretion and under proper regulations to be prescribed by him, out of any small-arms or pieces of field artillery belonging to the Government, and which can be spared for that purpose, such number of the same as may seem to be required for military instruction and practice by the students of any college or university under the provisions of this section; and the Secretary of War shall require a bond in each case, in double the value of the property, for the care and safe-keeping thereof and for the return of the same when required.

That is founded upon a provision in the sixteenth volume of the Statutes at Large, page 373, in connection with section 26, on page 336, of volume 14 of the Statutes at Large.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Section 1229 reads as follows:

The President is authorized to drop from the rolls of the Army for desertion any officer who is absent from duty three months without leave; and no officer so dropped shall be eligible for reappointment.

I move to add the following:

And no officer in the military or naval service shall, in time of peace, be dismissed from service except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect or in commutation thereof.

That is part of section 2 of the act of March 30, 1868, chapter 176 of the Statutes at Large.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend section 1227 by striking out the word "and" after the word "month," and inserting in lieu thereof a period or full stop; also to add after the word "commutation," at the end of the section, the words "shall be allowed to each;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 1277. Hospital-matrons in post or regimental hospitals shall receive ten dollars a month. Female nurses in general hospitals shall receive forty cents a day; and one ration in kind or by commutation shall be allowed to each.

That is taken from the joint resolution of July 4, 1864, thirteenth volume of the Statutes at Large.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Section 1314 of this revison reads as follows:

The superintendent and commandant of cadets may be selected and all other officers on duty at the Academy may be detailed from any arm of the service.

I move to amend by adding to the section the following:

But the academic staff as such shall not be entitled to any command in the Army separate from the Academy.

That is taken from the second volume of the Statutes at Large, section 2, page 720.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Section 1397, on page 306, has been amended to read as follows:

That there shall be in the Navy, for the public armed vessels of the United States in actual service, not to exceed —— chaplains, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I move to fill the blank by the words "twenty-four."

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will the gentleman state his authority for that?

Mr. LAWRENCE. By reference to page 691 of the volume of the commissioners' revision it will be seen that the commissioners reported the number of chaplains that might properly be appointed in the Navy at twenty-four. Mr. Durant, in his revision, struck out that number, and put in a provision declaring that the President might appoint chaplains, leaving the number unlimited. The question as to the number which the law authorized was somewhat discussed here on a previous evening, and the statutes were referred to. I will say for the information of the gentleman who makes this inquiry that the number was fixed by a statute which provided that there should be no greater number than the number in office on the 1st day of January, 1842. The following certificate from the Secretary of the Navy will show that at that date there were twenty-four chaplains in the service:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 31, 1874.

I certify that under the clause of the act of Congress approved 4th August, 1842,

"that, till otherwise ordered by Congress, the officers of the Navy shall not be increased beyond the number in the respective grades that were in the service on the 1st day of January, 1842," that at the latter date there were twenty-four chaplains on the list, and no change in the number of that grade has been authorized by Congress since the aforesaid act.

GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend section 1296 by inserting after the word "prescribe" the words "the uniform of the Army, and;" so that it will read:

The President may prescribe the uniform of the Army, and the quantity and kind of clothing which shall be issued annually to the troops of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment was in part explained in the debate in this House on the evening of the 22d of January last. The original article 100 of the Articles of War, as embraced in the act of April 10, 1806, (Statutes at Large, volume 2, page 371,) contained a provision that "the President of the United States shall have power to prescribe the uniform of the Army." That provision has never been repealed in express terms; but the commissioners on the revision of the laws supposed that it had been repealed by implication in a subsequent statute, the act of July 28, 1866, section 37, to be found in Statutes at Large, volume 14, pages 337 and 338. The provision was also omitted in Durant's revision. I understand that some members of the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on the Judiciary, advised the commissioners that, according to their construction, the provision had been repealed by the act of 1866. But I am authorized to state by one of the commissioners, Judge James, who, perhaps, did more work than any other one, that on further examination he is satisfied that article 100 of the Articles of War, giving the power to the President to prescribe the uniform of the Army, is still in force, and that the amendment we now propose should be made.

There are two reasons which operated upon my mind in recommending to the Committee on Revision of the Laws that the provision should now be incorporated in this revision. In the first place, when the provision was originally inserted among the Articles of War, it may be supposed that Congress adopted it because an army operating sometimes at once place and sometimes at another—sometimes in a warm climate and sometimes in a cold one—would find it necessary to have their uniform correspond to the climate, and that a change would very frequently be necessary. When, therefore, Congress afterward adopted by law the uniform which had been prescribed by the President, it may be supposed that Congress intended the uniform so adopted to continue until the President for some cause might deem it necessary to change it. The same reason which operated upon Congress in originally passing the law authorizing the President to change the uniform has continued ever since; and inasmuch as Congress has not taken away this authority by any express repeal, inasmuch as repeals by implication are not favored, and inasmuch as the necessity which originally operated on Congress may be presumed still to continue, I was of opinion, and the Committee on Revision of the Laws concluded, that the provision had not been repealed.

I submit a letter which I have received on this subject from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry of this day I have the honor to inform you that article 100, of the Articles of War, approved April 10, 1806, (2 Statutes, page 371,) provides as follows:

"The President of the United States shall have power to prescribe the uniform of the Army."

The act approved April 24, 1816, (3 Statutes, chapter 69, page 297,) enlarges the powers of the President in regard to the clothing of the Army.

These acts are still in force; and after a careful search of the Statutes at Large I can find no subsequent legislation which alters or restricts the authority of the President in this regard.

Very respectfully,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, M. C., House of Representatives.

I may state that substantially the same reasons operated in making the change as to rations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment I propose to submit is to add after section 1671 the following new sections:

SEC. —. The breech-loading system for muskets and carbines adopted by the Secretary of War, and known as the Springfield breech-loading system, is the only system to be used by the Ordnance Department in the manufacture of muskets and carbines for the military service.

SEC. —. No royalty shall be paid by the United States to any one of its officers or employés for the use of any patent for the system, or any part thereof, mentioned in the preceding section, nor for any such patent in which said officers or employés may be directly or indirectly interested.

I can state briefly the reason for the insertion of these sections.

Mr. POLAND. That matter was very fully explained this afternoon in the debate on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This amendment is founded on the act approved June 6, 1872, Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 261. The Secretary of War, in his annual report, makes the following reference to this subject:

A board of experienced officers, of which General A. H. Terry was president, was convened in September, 1872, for the selection of a breech-loading system for the muskets and carbines of the military service. After an exhaustive trial of all the systems presented, the board selected the Springfield breech-loading system as the one, of all those brought before it, which is best calculated to meet the demands of our military service.

The report of the board was approved, and the Springfield system of breech-loader will henceforth be used for the muskets and carbines of the Army. At the same time the caliber of all small-arms for the service—rifles, carbines, and revolvers—has been fixed at .45 of an inch. It is now a question of grave importance whether new arms of the accepted system shall not be made at once in sufficient quantities for a reserve supply in case of war, and to this end an appropriation of $500,000 has been asked for the next fiscal year for the manufacture, together with the materials now on hand, of about thirty-five thousand arms.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I wish to move an amendment to a part of this revision which has already been passed over; I refer to section 204, on page 41.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 204. The subordinate officers, clerks, and employés of the Department of State, and their respective salaries, shall be as follows:

One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,500 a year; Chief of the Diplomatic Bureau, at a salary of $2,400 a year; Chief of the Consular Bureau, at a salary of $2,400 a year; Chief of the Bureau of Accounts, at a salary of $2,400 a year; Chief of the Bureau of Indexes and Archives, at a salary of $2,400 a year; six clerks of class four, of whom one may be appointed disbursing clerk; nine clerks of class three, three clerks of class two, eight clerks of class one, one messenger, one assistant messenger, four watchmen, nine laborers.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by striking out in line 6 the word "Chief" and inserting "Chiefs," by adding the letter "s" after the word "Bureau," and by inserting the word "each;" so that the clause will read "two Chiefs of the Diplomatic Bureaus, each," &c.; also by making a similar change in the next clause, so that it will read "two Chiefs of the Consular Bureau, each," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I wish to move an amendment to the fifth clause of section 1572, which is as follows:

Fifth. "Diplomatic officer" shall be deemed to include embassadors, envoys extraordinary, ministers plenipotentiary, ministers resident, commissioners, chargés d'affaires, and secretaries of legation, and none others.

I move to amend this clause by inserting, after the words "chargés d'affaires" the word "agents."

I also move to amend section 1673 by inserting after the word "resident," in the first paragraph, the word "agents;" by inserting after "Honduras," in line 11, the words "San Salvador;" and by inserting the following new clause between lines 20 and 21:

Agent and consul-general at Alexandria, $3,500.

It is necessary to explain to the House these amendments are in consequence of raising the consulate at Alexandria to the diplomatic position of an agent.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 366, in schedule B, section 1688, to strike out lines 16, 17, 18, which are as follows:

I. AGENT AND CONSUL-GENERAL.

Turkish dominions:
Alexandria, $3,500.

And in line 19 to strike out "II" and insert "I."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 367, section 1688, between lines 30 and 31, to insert "Mexico, $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on the same page, between lines 33 and 34, to insert—

Italy:
Rome $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on the same page, line 39, to strike out "III" and insert "II."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 368, section 1688, to strike out lines 74 and 75, which are as follows:

Saint Lambert and Longueil, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 369, section 1688, to strike out line 132, which is as follows: "Pesth."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 371, section 1688, to strike out in line 192 "IV," and insert "III."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out lines 195 and 196, on page 371, which are as follows:

Hayti:
Port-au-Prince, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROMBERG. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to line 128, on page 369, where there is printed, "Barmen, $1,500." Is not that an error? Is not Barmen a misprint for Bremen?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I am not aware that it is an error.

Mr. BROMBERG. Bremen is before that.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That is at a different rate. I was not aware—I will state to the House as a matter of geographical ignorance—of any such place as Barmen, but I have been over in the State Department this list of consulates, and they there have suggested no alteration. If there is no such place it is certainly an innocent error. I will, however, give attention to the matter, and if it be a mistake will see it is hereafter corrected.

I move on page 372, section 1688, to strike out lines 212 and 213, which are as follows:

Danish dominions:
Saint Croix, $750.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on the same page to strike out in line 227 "Mexico, $1,000," and insert in its place "Tampico, $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 373, section 1688, to strike out lines 262 and 263, which are as follows:

LIBERIA.

Monrovia, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 374, line 278, to strike out the letter "s;" so that it will read "Navigator Island."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 382 to strike out section 1733, which is as follows:

SEC. 1733. The President is authorized, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cause examinations to be made into the accounts of the consular officers of the United States, and into all matters connected with the business of their offices, and he may appoint such agents as may be necessary for that purpose. Every agent so appointed shall, for the purpose of making such examinations, have authority to administer oaths and take testimony, and shall have access to all books and papers of all consular officers. Every such agent shall receive an annual salary of $5,000 in addition to his actual necessary expenses, the same to be paid out of the sum appropriated for consular salaries; but no greater sum than $10,000 shall be expended as compensation of such agents in any one year. The President shall communicate to Congress, at the commencement of every regular session, the names of the agents so appointed, and the amount paid to each, together with the reports of such agents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 385, in section 1743, to strike out all of line 3 after the word "legation;" and in line 4 the letter "C." The words stricken out are: "or for any officers mentioned in schedules B and C;" so it will read:

SEC. 1743. No compensation provided for any officer mentioned in section 1673, or for any assistant secretary of legation or any appropriation therefor, shall be applicable to the payment of the compensation of any person appointed to or holding any such office who shall not be a citizen of the United States; nor shall any other compensation be allowed in any such case.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move on page 394 to strike out section 1784, as follows:

SEC. 1784. No officer, clerk, or employé of the Government shall require or request any workingman in any navy-yard to contribute or pay any money for political purposes, nor shall any workingman be removed or discharged for political opinion. Every person who violates this section shall be dismissed from the service of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That completes all of the amendments the committee have to propose up to page 396, title 20, and all that part of the statutes at present under my charge.

I have been asked by several members to state the reason why section 1784 was reported to be stricken out, and the reason is it has been already passed in another place, and is merely an accidental repetition of the same thing. The members will find it in section 1546; which is as follows:

SEC. 1546. No officer or employé of the Government shall require or request any workingman in any navy-yard to contribute or pay any money for political purposes, nor shall any workingman be removed or discharged for political opinion; and any officer or employé of the Government who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be dismissed from the service of the United States.

Mr. CALDWELL. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the difference which exists between section 1784 and section 1546. The words are: "No officer, clerk, or employé" in section 1784, while in section 1546 the words are, "No officer or employé," leaving out in the latter section the word "clerk."

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I noticed that, and am of the opinion that a clerk is an employé of the Government. There was no intention to alter the meaning.

Mr. CALDWELL. I merely desired to call attention to the matter.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I may say that I am happy to inform my friend from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] that the place "Barmen," about which he inquired, has been found. It is somewhere in Prussia. I have not yet looked up what is the number of inhabitants, or endeavored to settle any of the other existing questions that may attach to it.

I have not anything further to submit to-night.

Mr. POLAND. The member of the committee who has charge of that portion of the work immediately following that we have now gone over has not yet been able to report to the committee. I ask unanimous consent to pass over the intervening titles and to take up a little further on, which is entirely disconnected with those which so far we have had under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would be in order without asking unanimous consent.

Mr. POLAND. The amendments I have to offer relate to title 62—"National Banks." The first is on page 1324, in section 5247.

Section 5246 combines the various laws in relation to the amount of circulation which national banks may have under the original acts of 1863 and 1864, namely, three hundred millions, and the subsequent fifty-four millions, making the whole amount three hundred and fifty-four millions. Section 5247 contains the provision for the withdrawal of twenty-five millions from existing banks in the Eastern States; and the revisers neglected to insert a proviso which I now offer as an amendment.

Section 5247 was as follows:

SEC. 5247. In order to secure a more equitable distribution of the national banking currency, there may be issued circulating notes to banking associations organized in States and Territories having less than their proportion, and the amount of circulation herein authorized shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, as it may be required for this purpose, be withdrawn, as herein provided, from banking associations organized in States having more than their proportion, but the amount so withdrawn shall not exceed $25,000,000.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Add to section 5247 these words:
Provided, That no circulation shall be withdrawn under the provisions of this section until after the fifty-four millions granted in the first section of the act of July 12, 1870, shall have been taken up.

That is the precise language of the proviso in the act of 1870.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 5249.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 5249. Any association located in any State having more than its proportion of circulation may be removed to any State having less than its proportion of circulation, under such rules and regulations as the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe.

Mr. POLAND. It will be observed that this section is the revision of another portion of that same act, providing that banks may be removed from one State to another, under such rules as the Comptroller of the Currency may prescribe. But the proviso in reference to that is not contained here. I therefore move to amend by adding to the section these words:

Provided, That the amount of the issues of said banks shall not be deducted from the issue of fifty-four millions mentioned in section 5246.

That is extracted from the act of 1870.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is to section 5254, on page 1326.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 5254. Every association organized under the preceding section shall at all times keep on hand not less than 25 per cent. of its outstanding circulation, in gold or silver coin of the United States; and shall receive at par in the payment of debts the gold notes of every other such association which at the time of such payment is redeeming its circulating notes in gold coin of the United States, and shall be subject to all the provisions of this title: Provided, That, in applying the same to associations organized for issuing gold notes, the terms "lawful money" and "lawful money of the United States" shall be construed to mean gold or silver coin of the United States.

Mr. POLAND. That section is a revision of a portion of that statute which authorized the establishment of gold banks to issue only notes payable in gold. That act provided that the issues of these banks might be in addition to the amount of circulation that was provided generally for national banks. This proviso has been left out. I therefore offer the following amendment:

Add to section 5254 the following:
And the circulation of such associations shall not be within the limitation of circulation mentioned in this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is on page 1333, section 5282.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 5282. In lieu of all other taxes payable to the United States, every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of $\frac{1}{2}$ of one per cent. each half-year upon the average amount of its notes in circulation, and a duty of $\frac{1}{4}$ of one per cent. each half-year upon the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of $\frac{1}{4}$ of one per cent. each half-year on the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of $\frac{1}{4}$ of one per cent. on the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1 strike out the word "other," and insert "existing;" and in lines 1 and 2 strike out the words "payable to the United States."

I will state that this is the provision in relation to the taxation of national banks. I agree entirely that the language which the commissioners used in preparing the revision is altogether better language and more appropriate than that which was used in the original statute. But there has been a very considerable amount of litigation over this subject of the taxation of the national banks. Several cases have been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and these words, as they stand in the statutes, have received a judicial construction. The committee, therefore, were of opinion that it was better to leave that language, which had been through the courts and received a judicial construction as to its meaning, than to undertake to improve it. We felt that we might do harm, and we certainly could do no good by making any change. We propose, therefore, to place in this section the precise language of the original act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment is in section 5310, page 1340.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 5310. All transfers of the notes, bonds, bills of exchange, or other evidences of debt owing to any national-banking association, or of deposits to its credit; all assignments of mortgages, sureties on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor; all deposits of money, bullion, or other valuable thing for its use, or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors; and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, made with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this chapter, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the section by adding these words:

And no attachment, injunction, or execution shall be issued against such association or its property before final judgment in any suit, action, or proceeding, in any State, city, or county municipal courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In speaking of the provisos in reference to the withdrawal of the circulation from existing national banks in the East, I used the expression that the commissioners had neglected to report that proviso. I understand now that their reason for not inserting it was that they were informed at the Treasury Department by some officer connected with the Bureau——

Mr. LAWRENCE. By Mr. Knox, Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. POLAND. That all those provisions had already been fulfilled; that it was a temporary statute; that all its requirements had been met; and that there was therefore no occasion for the insertion of this proviso. I did not mean by using the word "neglect" to cast the slightest imputation on either the diligence or the accuracy of the commissioners.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this is as far as any of the committee are prepared to go to-night; and I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. POLAND. I will withdraw it, if the gentleman has any suggestion to offer.

Mr. SHANKS. Section 2108 of this revision is as follows:

SEC. 2108. No agreement shall be made by any person with any tribe of Indians, or individual Indians not citizens of the United States, for the payment or delivery of any money or other thing of value, in present or in prospective, or for the granting or procuring any privilege to him, or any other person in consideration of services for said Indians relative to their lands, or to any claims growing out of, or in reference to, annuities, installments, or other moneys, claims, demands, or thing, under laws or treaties with the United States, or official acts of any officers thereof, or in any way connected with or due from the United States, unless such contract or agreement be executed and approved as follows:

First. Such agreement shall be in writing, and a duplicate of it delivered to each party.

Second. It shall be executed before a judge of a court of record, and bear the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs indorsed upon it.

Third. It shall contain the names of all parties in interest, their residence and occupation; and if made with a tribe, by their tribal authorities, the scope of authority and the reason for exercising that authority, shall be given specifically.

Fourth. It shall state the time when and place where made, the particular purpose for which made, the special thing or things to be done under it, and, if for the collection of money the basis of the claim, the source from which it is to be collected, the disposition to be made of it when collected, the amount or rate per cent. of the fee in all cases; and if any contingent matter or condition constitutes a part of the contract or agreement, it shall be specifically set forth.

Fifth. It shall have a fixed limited time to run, which shall be distinctly stated.

Sixth. The judge before whom such contract or agreement is executed shall certify officially the time when and place where such contract or agreement was executed, and that it was in his presence, and who are the interested parties thereto, as stated to him at the time; the parties present making the same; the source and extent of authority claimed at the time by the contracting parties to make the contract or agreement and whether made in person, or by agent or attorney of either party or parties.

All contracts or agreements made in violation of this section shall be null and void, and all money or other thing of value paid to any person by any Indian or tribe, or any one else, for or on his or their behalf, on account of such services, in excess of the amount approved by the Commissioner and Secretary for such services, may be recovered by suit in the name of the United States in any court of the United States, regardless of the amount of controversy; and one-half thereof shall be paid to the person suing for the same, and the other half shall be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Indian or tribe by or for whom it was so paid.

I desire to move to amend the fifth clause by striking out the words "which shall be distinctly stated," and inserting in lieu the words, "and shall be invalid unless so limited," so that it shall read:

Fifth. It shall have a fixed limited time to run, and shall be invalid unless so limited.

Mr. POLAND. I should prefer that the gentleman would allow his amendment to be referred to the Committee on Revision for examination by them.

Mr. SHANKS. I have already submitted it to that committee, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] said to me just a moment ago that I had better introduce now such amendments as I desired to have made. I notice that the provisions of the statutes are very much transposed in this revision.

Mr. POLAND. We certainly desire to include in this revision everything that is now in the law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] had a great deal to do with getting up certain bills in relation to Indians, which were passed into laws, and which will be found in the Statutes at Large, volume 16, pages 570 and 571, and volume 17, pages 136 and 137. I understand from Mr. Durant that the essential provisions of those statutes will be found in his revision, sections 2108 to 2111, both inclusive. I merely give these references now, so that they may go with the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and be considered by the committee.

Mr. SHANKS. I am willing that the amendment I have offered may be considered by the Committee on Revision.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move that the House now adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 22 in the affirmative, noes not counted.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that when the House adjourn to-night it be to meet at half-past seven o'clock to-morrow night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order. The question is upon the motion to adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 36, nays 26, not voting 227; as follows:

Mr. MYERS. My colleague, Judge KELLEY, is not well enough to attend the session of the House this evening. He was obliged to leave the Hall this morning before the close of the morning session. If he were here I think he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The House (at nine o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) accordingly adjourned.

I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. I would suggest to the Senator that as that petition respects an item in the naval appropriation bill, it should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well; let it go there then.

The prayer is to have an appropriation made so that these works may be completed, and thereby be a benefit, not only to that city, but to the whole commercial interest of that section of the Union. I move that the petition be printed, as it is one of importance, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I also present a like petition from more than 200 colored citizens of the city of Wilmington, North Carolina, with the same prayer. I move that this petition also be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RANSOM, it was Ordered, That the petitioners in the case of the steamer John McLean have leave to withdraw their petition and papers from the files.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to report adversely upon the petition of John Coonan, late second lieutenant of Company A, Eighteenth Regiment New York Cavalry, praying for an increase of pension. There is a report in the case, which I ask may be printed.

I will state in this connection that this petition seems to have been presented to the Forty-first Congress. According to the file-marks it was presented on March 11, 1870, and referred to the Committee on Pensions. It appears that it was then considered by the committee, and a report made by the Senator from Wisconsin who is not now in his seat, recommending an increase from the pension which he was then drawing of eight to fifteen dollars per month. In accordance with that report a bill was introduced and passed on the 17th May, 1870, increasing his pension from eight to fifteen dollars per month; and still Mr. Coonan is not happy. He has refiled, without a single change, the original petition which asked for the increase from eight to fifteen dollars per month. The committee, under the circumstances, have instructed me to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged, and the report printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 304) relative to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James Bremner, praying for the repeal of the act exempting church property from taxation in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and the committee was discharged from its further consideration.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the repeal of the laws exempting church property from taxation in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1756) to amend the act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 23, 1872, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 405) relating to placer-mining lands in the State of California, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 177) relating to the public lands in the State of California, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 322) granting a pension to Mrs. Alme D. Brooks, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SCOTT (by request of Mr. CONKLING, necessarily called away) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 450) for the relief of Armistead Burwell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 451) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FENTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 452) for the relief of John McHarg, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth collection district of the State of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 453) declaring lands heretofore granted to certain railroad companies subject to taxation; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF SUPERVISING SURGEON OF MARINE HOSPITALS.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of the report of the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the United States be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

FEES OF WITNESSES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before the Senate, or either of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of four dollars; for each mile he shall travel by the shortest route of usual travel in coming to, or going from the place of examination, the sum of five cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for travel when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial.

I will say one word on the resolution. The rule is not uniform between the two branches, as obviously it should be. Now we pay twice as much for travel as the House of Representatives. They pay four dollars a day for attendance, which I think is proper; but I think ten cents a mile for travel each way is evidently too much. This is to make our practice in conformity with that of the House. That is precisely the effect of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, subsequently said: I move to reconsider, with a view to make an amendment to it, the resolution adopted this morning in reference to the fees of witnesses.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is again before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will not offer the amendment now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

REPORT ON IRRIGATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the report on irrigation heretofore contributed to said Commissioner, at his request, by George P. Marsh, minister of the United States in Italy.

I will say that this article contributed by Mr. Marsh is considered to be very valuable by gentlemen residing in the West and on the plains, and it is thought very important that it should be published before the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture. It is a document of about fifteen pages only. Therefore it is that I have presented the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LANDS IN BITTER ROOT VALLEY.

Mr. STEWART. I appeal to the Senate to take up a bill for the extension of the time for some settlers to pay for their land in Montana Territory. The time will expire on the 5th of March. I move to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1168) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the removal of the Flathead and other Indians from the Bitter Root Valley, in the Territory of Montana," approved June 5, 1872.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section extends the time of sale and payment of pre-empted lands in the Bitter Root Valley, in the Territory of Montana, for the period of two years from the expiration of the time allotted in the act of June 5, 1872. The second section extends the benefit of the homestead act to all the settlers on these lands who may desire to take advantage of the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a new law.

Mr. STEWART. I will state exactly what it is. The act of June 5, 1872, provided for the removal of the Flathead Indians, and gave twenty-one months from the time of the passage of the act for the entry of and payment for these lands on the part of the settlers. The Commissioner states that the settlers were delayed by the operations of the Department in getting the surveys made. They have not had sufficient time to complete their entries and make payment. The time is nearly out. Besides, they are poor. It has been the policy of the Government in all time to relieve settlers on the public lands from the payment of the price of the land where they were not in condition to pay. Two years from now would not be an unreasonable time. It is but a short time since the land was surveyed, and therefore they have not had an opportunity to make their entries. The maps are hardly filed yet. They have not had the time that was contemplated by the act.

The second section of the bill extending the homestead law to the reservation is explained by communications from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. At the time of the passage of the act which provided for the removal of the Flatheads there was a section inserted that those who desired to stay and pre-empt might do so. There were, I think, between fifty and sixty families. Those who desired to stay and pre-empt were allowed to do so. The reason why the homestead provision was left out of that law was on the theory that, when they went, the money received would be expended in removing the Indians, so that it would cost the Government nothing. It appears that nearly all the Indians, some fifty-one or fifty-two families, have elected to stay upon the land; none have been removed, and none will be removed; consequently the money will not be required for their removal.

There is no reason for making a discrimination against these settlers and placing them in a more unfavorable situation than other settlers. They are far off on the remote frontier, and have a hard time enough any way, if they take the land after residing on it for five years under the homestead law. There is no reason why the homestead law should not apply to that land as well as to any other of the public lands. In fact, it has become the policy now to conform to the homestead law in all respects. The Commissioner has even recommended the repeal of the pre-emption laws altogether. This is entirely confined to actual settlers, and there is no reason why it should not apply to these settlers as well as to all others, and the second section is entirely proper and is approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I was not present in the Committee on Public Lands when this bill was considered; but it seems to me that the second section is open to the objection that it furnishes a way in which the same party might have the benefit of the homestead law in two forms and obtain two tracts under the homestead act; that is, a person occupying under the pre-emption laws may also have a homestead.

Mr. STEWART. No; there is a provision against that in all the laws. He has to swear——

Mr. BOUTWELL. But does not this constitute new legislation?

Mr. STEWART. It extends the homestead law to this tract. A man has to make the same affidavit as under that law. It will operate in this case just the same as in others.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the report of the Commissioner read if one accompanies the bill.

Mr. STEWART. Let the documents which I send to the desk be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of House bill No. 1168, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the removal of the Flathead and other Indians from Bitter Root Valley, in the Territory of Montana,' approved June 5, 1872," together with a request for my opinion on the same.

I have consulted with the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to the provisions of section 2, and base my opinion of the propriety of that section upon his statement that he should offer no objections to it.

I see no objections to any of the provisions of the bill.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. M. STEWART,
Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., December 4, 1873.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 30th October last, asking further instructions concerning sales of lands in Bitter Root Valley, Montana Territory, under act of June 5, 1872, I now transmit a copy of a report, dated the 2d instant, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to whom your communication was referred, from which you will perceive that the Indian Office is in receipt of a letter from Agent Shanahan, reporting that the schedule of selections of land made under said act for members of the Flathead tribe of Indians electing to remain in the Bitter Root Valley, which was forwarded by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, through the Department, on the 20th October last, will cover all cases of Indians entitled.

Such being the case, the Department concurs in the opinion expressed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that there is no necessity for further delay on the part of the General Land Office in notifying the proper local land officers to proceed to sell the unselected lands in the Bitter Root Valley to settlers; and you are therefore requested to take action accordingly.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO, Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

[Indorsement.]

Letter from the honorable Secretary of the Interior, stating that the Indian claims are all satisfied, and directing that the lands be now opened to entry by our white settlers.

DECEMBER 4, 1873.

NOTE.—From the above it will be seen that, allowing for time for instructions to reach the local land office, but two months remained to the settlers, the delay having virtually annulled the former act of Congress giving them twenty-one months.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, to fill the vacancy on the joint select committee to investigate the affairs of the District of Columbia, occasioned by the Senate having excused Mr. CONKLING from service on the committee.

BOUNTIES OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask the Senate to take up now Senate bill No. 14, in relation to bounties.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committeee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It provides that every volunteer, non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, or private, who volunteered under the proclamation of the President of the 3d of May, 1861, and of the orders of the War Department issued in pursuance thereof, and was actually mustered into the military service of the United States before August 6, 1861, in any regiment, company, or battery, and was accepted by the War Department under such proclamation and orders, shall be paid the full bounty of $100 promised to each and every volunteer by said proclamation and orders, if the same has not already been paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the bill explained.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will state that this is a bill similar to one which was introduced at the last Congress and passed the Senate, but did not pass the House of Representatives, probably for want of time. The bill then was a bill having special reference to the Fifth Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers; but it was suggested that there might be other volunteers who were similarly situated, and this bill covers all who are similarly situated.

The facts are substantially these: On the 3d day of May, 1861, the President issued a proclamation calling for 42,000 volunteers; the next day the Secretary of War issued his orders for the organization of those volunteers, and offered a bounty for all who volunteered for three years of $100. It appears that instead of there being 42,000 men who volunteered under that proclamation, there were over 80,000, and when the Pay Department, or the officers connected with the Treasury, attempted to meet the obligations of the Government by paying the bounties, they were perplexed to know to whom the payment was due. A law was passed in June, 1872, authorizing, or intended to authorize, the payment of all these volunteers; but the law passed in 1872 provided that the bounty should be paid to all who enlisted into the service of the United States on or before the 22d day of July, 1861, and all who were mustered into the service of the United States on or before the 6th day of August, 1861. The 6th day of August was a date arbitrarily fixed, but the 22d of July was fixed, because on that day the President issued another proclamation calling for more troops, and it was supposed that all who had enlisted or volunteered before that time came under the proclamation of the 3d of May; but as a matter of fact, the law stated that those who enlisted into the service of the United States prior to the 22d day of July, and who were mustered into the service of the United States before the 6th of August, 1861, should be entitled to the bounty. The officers of the Department determined that enlisting into the service of the United States before the 22d day of July required a mustering in; and therefore the construction was that, if men volunteered and enlisted into the service of the United States before the 22d of July and were mustered into the United States service before the 6th of August, they should be entitled to the bounty; whereas a few men of the Fifth Connecticut Regiment, mainly held in rendezvous, nearly all of whom had enlisted into the service of the State before the 20th of June, were, on the 22d of July, one day after the time fixed by the law, mustered into the service—that day being the day after the battle of Bull Run. But by the construction which the accounting officers placed upon the act which was intended forr relief relief they were deprived of the bounty.

Now, this bill provides that those who actually enlisted into the service and were mustered into the service under this proclamation, no matter where they reside, shall be entitled to the bounty which was promised by the President and the War Department.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. SCOTT. I offered a few days ago a resolution calling for information from the Post-Office Department. I ask for its consideration. It went over on the request of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The resolution was taken from the table, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to communicate to the Senate a statement showing how many of the contractors for the transportation of the mails on public routes having contracts on the 30th of June last had contracts for more than five of such routes allotted to them; how many of those in such cases were given out to sub-contractors, the prices at which they were allotted to the contractors; and also, so far as known to the Department or ascertainable from the accounts, the prices at which sub-contractors were paid; also, whether there is reason to believe that a class of professional bidders has grown up, who seek to obtain control of numerous routes by underbidding bona fide contractors, and then sub-letting to them at a profit; and whether legislation is needed to enable the Department to secure the services of bona fide contractors at the lowest price by refusal, under proper regulations, to allot contracts to such professional bidders.

WILLIAM H. VESEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Calendar will be taken up. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey. The question is on the passage of this bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PRATT. I see that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] is not in his seat this morning. It was he that made the principal opposition to this bill. I have conversed with an officer of the Treasury Department since this matter was up before, and he made the following explanation, and promised to communicate with me so that I could lay the communication of the Treasury Department before the Senate, but I have not received the letter as yet. His statement is to this effect: Mr. Vesey was a salaried officer; his compensation was $6,000 a year; the consular fees received at that port were considerably in excess of his salary. He made quarterly returns of all collections made for the United States to the house of Baring Brothers & Co., in London, where he was directed by the Treasury Department to deposit all moneys belonging to the United States in his hands. The failure of the house of Greene & Co., in Havre, with which house he had deposited the moneys of the United States, occurred early in March, 1857. He made a return at the expiration of that quarter, upon the 31st of March, and deposited with the house of Baring Brothers & Co. all of the moneys which had come into his hands belonging to the United States during that quarter, keeping nothing back. It is true that he was allowed by the Treasury Department to collect his salary out of the current receipts of the office for consular fees. He did so, and was in the habit of remitting to the house of Barings, in London, the amounts above what was due to him upon his salary, at the expiration of each quarter. Now I believe that the Senate is in possession of all the facts in the case. Under the instructions of the Treasury Department, of course he was allowed to retain from time to time the extent of his salary from the moneys which came into his possession, making at the expiration of each quarter a return of the balance of the public moneys which was in his hands. Now the question is whether this loss shall fall upon him or shall fall upon the Government, or shall be divided between the two.

I do not wish to be considered as the champion of this bill, but I have sought to put the Senate in complete possession of all the facts in the case for their intelligent action.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator know whether Mr. Vesey kept a general account of his own moneys together with the moneys of the Government, or whether this was a special deposit of the moneys belonging to the Government with the house of Greene & Co.?

Mr. PRATT. The deposit was made in his own name in this banking house of Greene & Co. He had no instructions from the Government to make any deposits in that house; but, on the contrary, he was required to deposit at the expiration of each quarter whatever money was in his hands in the house of Baring Brothers & Co. in London. This was deposited both for his own convenience and for the safety of the Government. The house of Greene & Co. was an old house, of some forty years' standing, in universally good credit. He took the opinion of the minister from this country to France at that time, Mr. Mason, I believe, as to the propriety of making his deposits there. American merchants in Paris, American travelers upon the continent, were in the habit of making their deposits with this house.

I believe I have submitted now all the facts necessary to be stated for the purpose of enabling the Senate to pass upon this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. If I understand the statement of the Senator from Indiana, it is that the Government ordered this consul to deposit his funds with Baring Brothers, and, instead of doing as he was directed, he deposited with a house of his own selection in Havre.

Mr. PRATT. No; the Senator misunderstands me.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, a part of these funds he transmitted to Baring Brothers, the excess over his salary.

Mr. PRATT. At the expiration of each quarter.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true. It seems to me that if he lost money by depositing in a local bank, he ought to bear the loss, and not the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckingham, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Fenton, Flanagan, Hitchcock, Kelly, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Sergent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, West, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Cameron, Carpenter, Crozier, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, and Oglesby—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Jones, Lewis, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—32.

So the bill was passed.

HIRAM PRATHER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 68) for the relief of Hiram Prather, late lieutenant-colonel of the Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It requires the accounting officers of the Treasury to ascertain the amount of pay and allowances due Hiram Prather, late lieutenant-colonel of the Sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry for services from the 2d of August, 1861, to the 20th of September, 1861, in the reorganization of the regiment for the term of three years, in the same manner as if he had been actually mustered at the time as such lieutenant-colonel; and also to ascertain the amount of his reasonable and usual expenses incurred in such reorganization; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay him the sums of money so ascertained to be due him, if the accounting officers shall find that neither Prather nor the State of Indiana has ever been paid or allowed for those services and expenses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; there is a printed report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, on the 14th of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Hiram Prather, of North Vernon, Indiana, late lieutenant-colonel of the Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, submit the following report:

The evidence shows that the Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry was organized in April, 1861, for three months' service under the call of the President of the United States, dated April 15, 1861; that said Hiram Prather was duly commissioned by the governor of the State of Indiana lieutenant-colonel of said regiment, and served in that capacity in the field until the 2d day of August, in that year, when the term of service of the regiment expired. They further find that permission had in the mean time been obtained by Governor MORTON from the President and Secretary of War to reorganize all of the three months' regiments, (including the Sixth,) for a term of three years, with the understanding that those of the original field-officers who would engage in recruiting and reorganizing their regiments should continue to hold their former rank under their original commissions.

They find that the said Sixth Regiment was recruited and reorganized under the direction and principally through the efforts of the former colonel and Lieutenant-Colonel Prather, and was mustered into the service on the 20th September, 1861, except one company, which was mustered in a few days later; that Lieutenant-Colonel Prather was re-mustered on his original commission September 20, 1861, for a term of three years; that he served as such lieutenant-colonel in the field until the 19th day of May, 1862, when his resignation was accepted and he was honorably discharged; that his services in recruiting and reorganizing the regiment for the three years' service were faithfully rendered, employing all his time from the 2d day of August, 1861, to the 20th day of September following, for which he has received no compensation whatever. They find that it was the understanding of the governor and Colonel Prather that the United States would allow and pay the latter the regular compensation of his rank for the time employed and services rendered in recruiting and reorganizing said regiment.

The committee thereupon report herewith the accompanying bill for the relief of Lieutenant-Colonel Prather.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENTS FOR MINING CLAIMS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that where applications for patents for mining claims have been filed in the proper district land office, and legal notice thereof given, without the appearance of an adverse claimant, and in which cases no further proceedings have been had for the purpose of perfecting title, such applicants shall make final proof and payment on the claims within six months from the date of its passage; and in cases of like applications for patents hereafter filed the applicants shall, in the absence of an adverse claim during the notice, make final proof and payment within six months from the date of filing such application, in default of which the proceedings for patent so had by such applicants shall be considered void and without effect. All affidavits required to be made under this act, the act to which it is supplemental, or the act to which that is amendatory, may be verified before any officer authorized to administer oaths, and all testimony and proofs may be taken before any such officer, and, when duly certified by the officer taking them, shall have the same force and effect as if taken before the register and the receiver of the district land office.

The Committee on Mines and Mining reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 1, line 8, to strike out the words "six months" and insert "one year;" and also in line 12 to strike out the words "six months" and insert "one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert at the end of section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That when such affidavits or proofs are taken at any place other than within the land district, it shall be by the clerk of any court of record.

Mr. SARGENT. I am further instructed by the committee, at the suggestion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to move to insert after the word "record," in the committee's amendment, the words "in the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the third section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. As I listened to the reading of the first section of the bill, it struck me that its language seemed to apply to cases pending in the Land Office at the present time. I will ask the Senator reporting the bill whether the language of the section will have an effect upon cases pending, and if so, what that effect will be?

Mr. SARGENT. I will state the exigency which this bill is intended to remedy. By the general mining law, passed a few years ago, it is provided that parties may apply to purchase of the United States the claims which they hold under the mining regulations, and may make proofs, &c., in order that any persons having adverse claims may come in and exhibit those adverse claims and have them determined. It is required that there shall be sixty days' publication, and that after the expiration of that sixty days' publication no further adverse claims shall be presented. That is the law as it now stands. It is found in practice that after the sixty days expire the parties do not then go on and pay the Government for the land, as they ought to do. They simply rest on that; there can be no adverse claim after that; they have possession of the land, but do not ripen it into a title. Now it is proposed that they shall come forward, at any rate within one year after it has been determined in their favor either by trial or by the absence of any adverse claim, and pay the money, in order that the Government may receive the money for this land. Of course it applies to cases pending, because the difficulty arises in those cases. Probably three-fourths of those who apply for patents, after they have got by any point of danger, then rest upon their cases and do not pay the money. As it is a fair bargain between them and the Government, when they apply for the patent, that they shall have the land if entitled to it, and on behalf of the Government that they shall pay the money, this bill simply provides that they shall pay the money, and gives them one year, a reasonable time, in which to do it. I will state that the bill has the entire concurrence of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose letter I hold in my hand.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to hear the first section of the bill read again.

The Chief Clerk read the first section.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to inquire of the Senator from California whether this bill has been submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and whether it has his approval in all respects.

Mr. SARGENT. It has his approval in all respects, as appears by his letter, which I hold in my hand. In this letter he suggests an amendment, which has been adopted by the committee and incorporated in the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 345) to relieve certain persons therein named, late members of Company K, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of mutiny;

A bill (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1754) to amend the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Amos Farling," approved February 5, 1873; and

A bill (S. No. 216) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Fearless.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 345) to relieve certain persons therein named, late members of Company K, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of mutiny;

A bill (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, on the registers, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being House bill No. 792.

Mr. LOGAN. I see that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW] is not in his seat, and the next bill on the Calendar is one in which he felt a great deal of interest. It passed the House of Representatives and Senate before, but failed to receive the approval of the President. It has now been amended to meet his suggestion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it about?

Mr. LOGAN. An appropriation for damages sustained by the East Tennessee University.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will lead to debate.

Mr. LOGAN. If it leads to debate, of course I shall not ask to have it taken up; but I presume it will not be debated now, inasmuch as it has passed the Senate before after debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate is not composed now as it was when the bill passed before, and as it opens the question of war claims, I have no doubt that it will lead to some discussion.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I shall not urge the request.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will remain on the Calendar in its proper place.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the seventh section of the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary to strike out "forty," before "days," in line 41, and insert "ninety."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend to go over this ground again, although I have not said much upon this precise topic; but I rise merely to remind the Senate of a fact which perhaps has not been stated before, that this clause, standing originally at fourteen days, which is twice the length of time allowed by the English bankrupt law, and the Scotch and the French and other commercial laws, we, I believe, unanimously agreed in the first instance in committee to put it at thirty days instead of forty, on the idea that thirty days was as long a time as with safety to the interests of both debtor and creditor the debtor's affairs—he being a merchant, banker, trader, &c.—could remain in suspense. We supposed that he would be able to find out in that time what he could do, and that the creditors would be able to find out in that time how he stood, so that all parties could see what was best to be done. But on reconsidering the matter again, in order to go the utmost limit that we could in favor of the debtor and of justice to the whole body of creditors, we stretched it up to forty days, and we went into a calculation respecting the stay-laws of some of the States which have the quickest laws for the collection of debts; like the State of New York, for instance, where you can get a judgment on a note of hand, against a man who is so honest that he will not swear to a false defense, in twenty days. On twenty days' notice you can get a judgment. Then you have to advertise for the sale of the property; I think it is thirty days more or something of that kind before a perfect lien can be got. So we run the line for the State of New York, for instance, just as close as it is possible to run it and protect the debtor and the body of his creditors from the unjust lien that one creditor would get by bringing an action at law against him and getting his judgment in spite of the debtor and of the other creditors within this time.

Now, the answer may be suggested that the debtor can go into bankruptcy himself if he finds that a creditor is doing this. That is true; but suppose it happens to be a favorite creditor, suppose it happens to be one that he wishes may get his debt to the exclusion of all the rest. The law does not oblige the debtor to defend. It is not a fraud that he does not put in a defense. The Supreme Court have so decided. Then the preference is got just the same. But suppose otherwise; suppose the debtor does wish to make an equal distribution of his property among his creditors: if he is to be assailed by each one in succession within these forty days, or within ninety, as is proposed, then he goes voluntarily into bankruptcy. Where does that leave him? Unless, then, he is able to pay 33 per cent. in cash dividends to his creditors, he cannot get a discharge; and he is left then, after he has been gone through with in that way, just as he is under these suits by the State laws, entirely penniless, his business all broken up, and with no means to begin the world again; because he cannot get credit as long as there are other creditors who would pounce upon anything that he borrowed or hired the very moment he started any fresh business, and break him up again.

Then, Mr. President, with the conservative element introduced for the first time in any bankrupt law of requiring this large union of creditors, one-fourth in number and one-third in amount, to force a man into bankruptcy, I suggest to the good judgment of the Senator who offers this amendment whether he is in favor of continuing this law as a whole or not; that, if you are to have a law, you cannot extend this period without the most serious evil consequences.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, there is one view of this amendment which I have not heard taken, and I think an important one. This provision in the law does not apply to contracts, or to book-accounts, or to sealed bills, or to bonds, or to due bills, or to promissory notes that are payable to the payee only. So it does not reach at all the class of contracts as to which it has been objected to; it only applies to commercial paper. It seems to me that all this argument about pea-nut women and hucksters and farmers being troubled by this provision has nothing in it. This provision, which it is now sought to strike out, only applies to those who elect to have it apply to them. If they choose to make their contracts in the form of commercial paper, negotiable, payable to order, then it applies to them; but if they do not choose to make their contracts in that way, retaining this provision in the law does not, by any possibility, do them any injury.

There is a peculiar class of law which applies to commercial paper. In the hands of a bona fide holder, before maturity, no defense can be made to it. If it is not paid on the day, it is considered dishonored. Now, we must have one uniform rule of bankruptcy all over the United States; and for one part of the country to say that commercial paper must lie over ninety days before proceedings can be taken would be disturbing the whole commercial law of the world. If any trader does not want to be subject to this law, let him avoid making negotiable paper, and the law does not reach him at all.

I really think that it would be a great injury to the merchants of Chicago to have the law adopted as is insisted by their representatives here it should be. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] asked, Why not make the time ninety days if you make it forty days? I confess I cannot give any answer to that question. The error is in making it forty days. The seven days in England, and the fourteen days in this country, under the existing law, were to provide against accident. A man might be away from home; a snow-storm might come on; or he might by some accident lose his funds and be unable to supply them. Therefore the fourteen days were given; and the error in this bill is in making it forty days instead of fourteen.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey seem to me to be very appropriate, and to have in them a great deal of force. The idea had not been suggested before. It strikes me that the alarm manifested by our friends here in regard to this bill is without foundation. At all events I confess my inability to appreciate it.

This bill, as has been repeatedly remarked, is much more lenient than is the existing law; and if there is so much danger in this bill, it seems to me that under the former one we should have had the demonstrations of damage and injury to the debtor class that are now apprehended; and yet we look around us and find none of these. Scarcely an instance, so far as I know, has occurred where a small dealer, coming within the province of this law, has been proceeded against at all. It is no small matter to the plaintiff in a proceeding of this sort to commence to put a debtor into bankruptcy. He incurs expense himself; he has to employ his attorney; and unless he is certain of securing a considerable portion of the debts due him, he has to pay all the expenses out of his own pocket. For that reason creditors are not so anxious to commence such proceedings.

But, sir, I think this bill is in the interest of the debtor class. By enacting this law and having it to supersede the State laws in regard to the collection of debts, small dealers are protected; and I venture to say that where one has been injured by proceedings in bankruptcy hundreds, and possibly thousands, have been broken up by proceedings under the State laws; and in some of the States the bankrupt law is a matter of simple, naked justice to the creditor class. In my own State, for instance, we have no local law by which the estate of a debtor can be distributed among his creditors so long as he is alive; and the only recourse left to the debtor, when proceedings are taken which are likely to give precedence to a creditor, is to resort to proceedings in bankruptcy.

Then there is another view which is in the interest of the debtor class; that is, that when you break a man up, as is frequently the case under the State laws, he gets no relief; he is not discharged from his debts. After you take everything that he has, and exhaust him, that is the end; but when once his estate is gone under proceedings in bankruptcy, he is relieved by the law; he is released from his indebtedness, and can proceed to reinstate himself again, to renew his fortune, and become a useful citizen.

The clause now under consideration only applies to commercial paper, as has been remarked. Therefore it does not affect the great mass of the dealers, particularly in the rural districts. There is a large portion of them that do not make commercial paper at all. Unless they want to buy their goods upon a long credit, or to go into transactions which are larger than their ready means will justify, they do not indulge in the luxury of commercial paper at all. This provision, then, is confined to that class of men who are expected to be prompt, who expect themselves to be prompt in their transactions; and if it occurs that one of them shall be unfortunate, a breathing spell is usually extended unless some more rapacious creditor is making an effort through the State laws to secure priority of lien by judgment and execution; and when one of those debtors who avail themselves of commercial paper fails for forty days, I apprehend he is usually gone, and generally his affairs ought to be wound up. The most of them, as I remarked, are prompt dealers, and they keep their debts paid up. If they have a note coming due which is regarded as commercial paper, and are the right sort of business men, they attend to that; they see to it; and it is only from some misfortune that they are left without the means of paying it. I think it will be found, as I remarked in the beginning, that the alarm of our friends at the passage of this bill is without foundation. It is much better in every regard for the debtor class. The time is extended. It requires one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of the creditors to put a man into bankruptcy at all, whereas heretofore it required creditors only to the amount of $250. It is much better than the original law; and it seems to me that the gentlemen who are opposing this bill are opposed to any bankrupt law at all. They should support this bill, they should accept it, being so much better than the present law, or they must take the position of opponents of any bankrupt law at all. In my judgment, those who think they are operating in the interest of the debtor class should accept this bill and take it as beneficial to them.

We cannot get along in this country without a bankrupt law. It has been tried frequently from the foundation of the Government. Whenever a panic has come upon the country, resort has always been had to a bankrupt law. The history of this country, as well as the history of every commercial community, shows that it is a necessity. This bill, I think, is well guarded in every respect. It is in the interest of the debtor class, while the creditor class are not injured by it. I think, taking it all in all, that it is better to support the report of the committee. All the other provisions are kind and good, and much more lenient to the debtor than the present law; and I think this one is peculiarly so. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment to extend this time, believing that it would be to the prejudice of the debtor class if this extension should be granted.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have refrained thus far from participating in the discussions on this bill, not because I did not feel a very deep interest in it, but because it has been very fully discussed by those having charge of it and those presenting amendments, and for the additional reason that I have not been in good enough physical health for the last few days to give close attention to the business of the Senate. But the amendment pending, in the view taken of it by some Senators, is supposed very injuriously to affect the debtor class—I mean the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio presupposes that the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee is injurious to the debtor class—and as I feel satisfied that my constituents are as largely interested in this question as those of any Senator on this floor, I rise to say a very few words upon the pending proposition.

I may say, Mr. President, that I have been somewhat surprised at the tone of the discussion upon some of the amendments, assuming that there was any disposition in this legislation to be harsh upon the debtor class. The whole history of the bankrupt legislation in the United States exhibits continuous progress in favor of the debtor class. Indeed, I might go further than that and say that it is a total departure from the original idea of a bankrupt law. The original English bankrupt law simply enabled creditors to secure distribution of the estates, and to imprison the persons of fraudulent debtors of one or two classes. It did not contemplate relief to the debtor at all. It did not contemplate relief to the large class of debtors outside of traders and merchants. When the provision of our own Constitution became the subject of judicial action the attempt was made to restrain it within the narrow limits of the intention of the English bankrupt law; but the spirit of our institutions prevailed over that attempt, and every bankrupt law that has been placed upon the statutes, instead of aiming simply to secure the distribution of the estates of fraudulent debtors or to punish fraudulent debtors, has undertaken to extend relief to unfortunate debtors. And now, in view of what has occurred within the last few months, Congress is again appealed to for the purpose of modifying the bankrupt law in favor of that class; and I think that the amendments now proposed all go in that direction; and it is because the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has the effect of extending that proposed relief to debtors, as he supposes, much further than the amendment of the committee, that I rise now to speak of it.

What is the relief that is proposed? It is this: that the term of fourteen days which debtors now have before they can be put into bankruptcy shall be extended to forty days. What class of debtors is that? It is not all classes, not the small traders of the country, not the small merchants of the country, to any great extent, although the term "merchant" may embrace many of them, but it is those that were originally contemplated by the bankrupt law, merchants and traders, with the addition of those classes whose occupations assimilate their money and business engagements very much to the merchant and trader, bankers, brokers, manufacturers, and miners, classes that deal in commercial paper.

The point that I make about the pending amendment is, that it only applies to the case of those persons who have suspended payment for a period of forty days. That means where they have failed to meet their commercial engagements. Now, I think I do not overstate it—certainly, if I do, there are commercial men enough on this floor to correct me—when I say that a protest of the paper of any one of the classes herein enumerated is of itself almost equivalent to bankruptcy. The man in these enumerated classes who fails to meet his paper on the day it is due is discredited in every commercial circle in which he has business. That being the case the fourteen days were not intended, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] argued, to enable him to dispose of his property to meet his creditors; the forty days are not now intended to enable him to do so; nor would the ninety days, if adopted, be intended for that purpose, or enable him to do so, but it does enable him to renew his paper, to gain time with his creditors, and to avoid this bankruptcy, if his assets are such as to satisfy his creditors that there is good reason for giving him time.

I am satisfied that the forty days will avoid the hardships that have arisen from such cases as have been instanced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] of absence from home, of accidents, or some occurrence which prevents a man from knowing exactly the extent to which he has been unfortunate in his business relations, and making the necessary arrangements to meet it. For that reason, although perhaps, in the view that might be taken of it by many, ninety days might be an advantage to the debtor class, I think upon sound principles of public policy as relating to the classes to which alone this provision applies, forty days give the opportunity to do all that can be expected to be done in the matter of securing time from creditors and avoiding the proceedings in bankruptcy.

Mr. President, we ought not to look upon this question of a national bankrupt law in any other than a serious business light. It is a very great advantage to the classes of debtors intended to be benefited by it. Much has been said of State insolvent laws, and of the proceedings under them. I do not agree to some of the criticisms that have been passed upon the inadequacy of those insolvent laws, much less to some of those which characterize them as harsh and unfeeling; but let them be as beneficial as they may, it is to be remembered that their operation is only local, and in the extended ramifications of business in our country a discharge under an insolvent law in one of the States has only a territorial operation. The State of Massachusetts undertook to give a State insolvent law an extraterritorial operation by incorporating in it the provision that, if the contract made elsewhere required payment in the State of Massachusetts, it should operate outside of the State—upon the debtor who lived in Louisiana or Mississippi, for instance; but that attempt failed, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that the discharge of a debtor under a State insolvent law has no extraterritorial operation. Here, then, is this whole class of creditors who are to be benefited by a discharge forever from the obligation. Under the State law, let it be as humane as it may, unless the debt was contracted after the passage of the law which authorized a final discharge, the State law cannot finally discharge them, for it is held to be in violation of that clause of the Constitution forbidding a State law to impair the obligation of a contract.

This, therefore, is really in all its aspects a most beneficial and humane law to the debtor; and I am not disposed to stand upon mere differences of opinion as to whether forty days, or fifty days, or sixty days, is the time within which a debtor may be enabled to make this arrangement with his creditors. Looking at it in the light in which I do, that the protest of the paper of any one of these classes is virtual bankruptcy, and that forty days will enable him to arrange with his creditors for time to renew his paper and satisfy them of the extent of his assets, and to get upon his feet again if he can ever get on them, I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CROZIER. It seems to me there is still another view of this subject that has not been taken by any Senator engaged in the discussion, which I will endeavor briefly to present. The amendment provides that it shall require one-fourth of the creditors in number, and one-third in amount of debts held by them, to put an individual into bankruptcy, and that the paper upon which he is put into bankruptcy must have been due for forty days. The objection made to the forty days seems to be that in forty days the party cannot arrange for the payment of his debts to prevent the operation of the bankrupt law, but that ninety days will give him a further opportunity. Senators will see that in order to put a man into bankruptcy, say forty days from the 1st of October, or any other given day, it will be necessary that on the 1st of October one-third of all his liabilities in the form of commercial paper shall have been due. One-third of them on that particular day must have been due before the debtor can be put into bankruptcy within forty days thereafter. It would be a very bad business policy, it seems to me, that could justify such an arrangement as that, to wit, that a man would so conduct his business that one-third of his business paper would fall due at about the same time. That has not been my experience. The experience of most business men is to make their paper fall due at different times, a small proportion at a time, and not the whole of it or one-third of it within a few days, so as to put into operation this act.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator whether it is necessary that the paper of other creditors should be overdue to enable them to join with the one whose paper has gone overdue?

Mr. CROZIER. It seems to me it would be a very harsh proceeding to put a man into bankruptcy when his paper was not due.

Mr. MORTON. I ask my friend if that is not the provision of the law? If one man's note goes over for forty days, may not the other creditors, whose paper is not overdue, join with him in putting the debtor into bankruptcy?

Mr. CROZIER. Under the law as it now stands, that would be the case; but if the law is so amended as to require one-third in amount of the creditors to join, it seems to me if their paper is not due they are not in a position to join. They have no right to complain until their debts are due.

Mr. LOGAN. It only requires one-third of his creditors and not a third of the paper due.

Mr. MORTON. It need not be due.

Mr. CROZIER. Under the law as it stands now, any one may put the law in force, no matter what the amount of debt is, provided it is $250. Of course, then the proceeding is started, and the rest can join in whether the paper is due or not; but I think the proper construction of this amendment would be that those who take the initial step must be men with matured paper in their hands. If that be the correct view of the law, it seems to me that forty days would be long enough to enable a man to provide for such paper as ought to fall due within that time.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to discuss this question, but I merely rise to suggest to my friend from Kansas that he is certainly mistaken in the proposition that he states. I do not think he will find that any court will give the provisions of this law that construction. It does not provide that one-third of the indebtedness shall be due, but it only provides that forty days after commercial paper is due and one-fourth of the number of creditors, holding one-third of the value of the debts, agree to it, the party may be put into bankruptcy. It makes no difference whether the other portion of the creditors have matured paper or not. It may be done by a third of the creditors on a portion of the paper suspended for forty days. The Senator is certainly mistaken in his proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the seventh section of the committee's amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut Mr. FERRY, who is detained by illness. If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. CLAYTON. I am requested by my colleague, [Mr. DORSEY,] to state that he is detained from the Senate by sickness.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 15, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Clayton, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Johnston, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Ransom, Sherman, Spencer, and West—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Chandler, Cooper, Crozier, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Stevenson, Stewart, Sumner, Thurman, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Howe, Ingalls, Jones Lewis, Norwood, Patterson, Ramsey, Schurz, Sprague, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend this section by striking out, in line 45 and wherever the expression occurs in the section, the words "one-fourth," and inserting "one-third" and striking out "one-third" wherever it occurs and inserting "one-half," so as to require one-third of the creditors in number and holding one-half in amount of the debts to join in the petition. I suppose there will be no objection to that amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, it seems to me that it would be quite as easy to secure one-half of the creditors as one-third of them. The same notice can as well be sent by any creditor who desires to put a debtor into bankruptcy to one-half of the creditors as to one-third. If a debtor is required to appear before a court in order to show cause why he is not to become a bankrupt, it seems to me that at least one-half of his creditors should require a man so to appear, simply for the reason that he does not pay his commercial paper. I can see no rule that would apply to one-third that would not equally apply to one-half. In other words, the committee have proposed here an arbitrary rule. They must, of course, fix it at some point. Now, a majority of creditors, as I understand this bill, can compromise the debts, can arrange with the debtor; and it seems to me that a majority of them should be required to concur before a simple failure to pay commercial paper should be adjudged an act of bankruptcy.

I have no further argument or suggestion to make with reference to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit to my honorable friend from Iowa that he is not quite just when he says that upon principle this number may just as well be one-half or two-thirds or the whole, and for this reason: if you wipe it all out, and have no bankrupt law at all, it is a principle of natural justice, as well as of law, that the debtor is at the instant mercy of every creditor separately, and he is bound to pay them according to his engagements, and he is bound to have his property, and in some countries still, I am sorry to say, his body, arrested and disposed of in the one case, and imprisoned in the other, in satisfaction of his debts.

Now, beginning with that philosophical statement of a fact to which all men agree in every civilized country, and upon which society itself is based, as you may almost say, where do you find yourself? You find yourself, then, in a bankrupt bill, proceeding to act upon the man who does not do that thing and keep his obligations, and you provide that in such a case, which I believe every philosopher, every writer, and every legislative principle of every country provides for, if he is to be broken up and his property distributed among his creditors, it ought to be done equally. Then you take that step. Here the question is, on the other side, that of mercy and misfortune; whether in the case of an honest man there ought not to be some limitation for a short period of time before his estate shall be entirely wound up, consistent also with securing to the body of the creditors, while he is in this uncertain condition, against any preference or fraud or wrong upon the part of the other creditors? So far I am sure my friend will agree with me, because I am stating the universal consent of mankind.

Now we come to what this limitation shall be. As I stated a little while ago, for the first time, I believe, in the history of legislative jurisprudence, if I can so speak, or rather of judicial legislation, to speak more properly, the Judiciary Committee of this body has introduced this merciful clause, saying that under the laws of the United States, while we resist fraudulent operations of other creditors acting for themselves, we will still protect the innocent debtor from the action of this law until a third in amount and a fourth in number of his creditors join. Why that sum and that number? That is the question that my friend has asked, and I trust, if he has followed me so far, I shall be able to satisfy him in a moment. This is a limitation upon the exercise of what would otherwise be an absolute right on the part of every creditor whose debt amounted to $250, or, as in the English law, £50. Now we say we will try the experiment of limiting this absolute right which a man has even to the administration of this law; we will put it in a condition where the malice of one creditor or two shall not drive the debtor into bankruptcy; we will put it into a condition where the inability of a particular creditor to get the preference that he may wish for will not enable him to threaten the debtor and say, "Now, I will put you into bankruptcy if you do not pay me."

But there must be a limit to this exercise of absolute right, and a limit to the limitation of it. If you are to say that no debtor shall be compelled to pay his debts under the provisions of this bankrupt law unless all the creditors want him to pay, then it would be easy for him to find a favorite creditor, a friend of his, who would say, "I never will have this man's estate distributed. I will never have him pay. I am not in favor of his keeping his engagements, and I will bear his not keeping his to me, and hold all the rest of you at bay, and will turn you over to the State laws to get what you can; and as you cannot get him into bankruptcy, he can make a preference to me under the State law which will secure me entirely, and you will get nothing." Therefore it is impossible to say that the concurrence of all shall be required. What then? You should go just far enough to satisfy the just judgment of a court that the proceeding against the debtor is not one which is based on malice or hard feeling or extortion, but is based upon the reasonable judgment of a fair number of those who are called upon to be interested in his estate.

We thought on a careful consideration that we had fixed on the true number. To be sure, you might vary the number by a small fraction either way, and say that it does not make any substantial difference; but, as I have stated before, out of consideration to the feeling in the country for the debtor class, we have already carried these provisions to the extreme verge, and in some instances beyond the point where the committee, if they were left to their own judgment alone, would have carried them; and thus it has been that we have felt obliged to defend, as well as we could, the Senate against going any further. We have gone as far as we thought either safety to the debtor or safety to the creditor would allow.

Now let me remind my friend from Iowa, turning to another clause in this bill, which the committee also have put in for the first time, that when a case has got into bankruptcy, and has proceeded far enough to have a correct inventory of the debtor's assets and a valuation of them, and a correct statement of the proof of his debts, so that it may be known judicially exactly how he stands, and every creditor has had a right to have an inquiry made into what has become of his property, then if a majority in number and amount of the creditors and the debtor himself agree, the court has the power to dismiss the proceeding. That is another protection to the debtor.

Now, I do submit to my friend in all candor if, going as far as we have in this direction, and without any precedent in the commercial code of any other country, he ought not to be satisfied instead of forcing it to an unreasonable extent.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, only a word in reply. As I understand the chairman of the committee, this is really an arbitrary amount, and in this particular case a debtor is thrown into bankruptcy simply for a failure to pay his commercial paper. He may have three times the amount of assets necessary to pay that paper, but if he does not pay or raise all his commercial paper within forty days, then he is to be adjudged absolutely a bankrupt; but it is provided that the court shall not declare him a bankrupt unless one-fourth in number of his creditors, and they holding one-third in amount of his indebtedness, shall petition the court for that purpose. It seems to me that this power might very easily and properly be extended to a majority of the creditors, so that a majority of the creditors may say, "Now this debtor cannot pay his debts, yet he has an abundance of assets with which to pay them within a reasonable time; we will not throw him into bankruptcy." But, as this provision stands, it is in the power of one or two or three persons to throw a debtor into bankruptcy although he may have an abundance of means to pay his debts.

By analogy to the other propositions contained in the committee's amendments, it seems to me but fair that this whole question should be placed in the hands of a majority of the creditors. It is just as easy for a majority of them to throw him into bankruptcy as for a majority to make composition with him afterward; and I must confess that I can see no rule except an arbitrary one that fixes this at one-third rather than one-half.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this is a practical question. It is a question about which there is nothing of principle that I know of, one way or the other, because in principle one-half of a man's creditors or two-thirds of a man's creditors have no more right to deal with him than one, or one-fourth, or the whole. There is no matter of principle about it. It is a practical question. Then let us look at it in that light.

Here we propose to pass a bankrupt law. If we intend to pass it, we intend to pass one that will be effective; one that will not be a dead-letter on the statute-book; one that can be executed, and not one that never can have execution. Very well, then; we are now at the threshold of a bankrupt proceeding. A man has suspended payment of his commercial paper and remained in a state of suspension for forty days—a long time for a man of one of the classes mentioned here to be in a state of suspension. At the end of those forty days creditors of his, one-fourth in number and holding one-third of his indebtedness, say "This man had better be put into bankruptcy;" what is the presumption? The presumption certainly is that if so large a proportion in amount and value shall say "This is a case in which the interests of the creditors require that this man shall be put into bankruptcy," that would be the opinion of the whole body of his creditors if there were time to consult them; for it must be for the interest of all the creditors to put him into bankruptcy or this fourth would never agree to put him into bankruptcy. They can gain no advantage by putting him into bankruptcy; they can only come in, precisely like every other creditor, for a dividend of the assets; they can have no possible interest to put him into bankruptcy unless it is equally to the interest of all the rest of the creditors to institute the proceedings. Very well, then, we propose to let them commence, one-fourth in number and one-third in amount; but if it should turn out that this presumption is not true; if it should turn out that a majority of the creditors in number and value think otherwise, what then have we provided? We have provided that upon their representing that fact to the court, and the creditors having due notice, and the court hearing what may be said upon it, if the court shall be of the same opinion as a majority of the creditors, that it is not wise to put that man into bankruptcy, the whole proceeding may be dismissed, unless the debtor choose to say that it shall go on.

What more could be asked? Why require in the first instance that you shall obtain one-half in number of the creditors, when you have provided that if a majority of the creditors in number and amount see fit to have that proceeding discontinued they may have it discontinued, with the consent of the debtor and the approval of the court? I cannot conceive that there is any necessity for it whatsoever. It cannot be for the benefit of the creditors that you should require one-half, for, as I have already said, if a man is put into bankruptcy by a single creditor, that creditor gets no preference by putting his debtor into bankruptcy; it must be because it is the interest, not only of him, but of all the rest of the creditors, that he should go into bankruptcy, if there is any interest in putting him in at all. And therefore it is not for the interest of all the creditors that you should require one-half.

Is it for the interest of the debtor that you should require one-half in the first instance in order to file a petition in bankruptcy? Certainly it is not for his interest, for that is carefully guarded by the other provision, that if he can get a majority in number and amount of his creditors to concur with him in asking the court to dismiss that proceeding, and the court is satisfied that it is for the interest of all the creditors to dismiss it, it can be dismissed. There is a further provision for a composition between the debtor and his creditors.

I do think, therefore, that it is impossible to conceive that there can be any oppression of a debtor by retaining this provision in the bill precisely as it stands. There certainly can be none when, if the debtor can get a majority of his creditors in number and value to ask the court to dismiss the proceeding, it can be dismissed.

But, sir, when we look at it in a practical point of view, I am apprehensive that even the provision as we have it will be found a little difficult of execution, and that is the opinion of many who have criticised and reviewed this provision in the bill. Take the case of a great banking firm—take the case of Jay Cooke & Co. I do not know how many creditors Jay Cooke & Co. had, but I think I have seen them stated at many tens of thousands. Perhaps the Senator from Pennsylvania can give us some idea of the number.

Mr. SCOTT. The list of creditors filled four or five columns of the New York Herald. I never counted the number.

Mr. THURMAN. I think I heard somebody say they amounted to 80,000. To require one-fourth in number, if they are 80,000, would be 20,000 people; if 40,000, 10,000 people; if 20,000, 5,000 people—is really making it very difficult to commence bankrupt proceedings in such a case at all. But take the case of other bankers; take the case of some private bankers who suspended in New York City during the late panic, and who had creditors all over this Union, especially western and southern bankers and bankers in the interior, who made their deposits with these New York bankers, keeping a deposit account with them, and also had their own depositors in the city of New York; and just consider for one moment how difficult it will be with the provision as it is to comply with it and get one-fourth in number and one-third in amount. This, of all the provisions in this bill, has been subjected to the severest criticism and the strongest condemnation, not by registers in bankruptcy alone, but by business men, who have no interest in the world to oppress their debtors, but, on the contrary, whose interest it is that the most that can be made out of the assets of the debtor shall be made both for his benefit and their own. They say, and with no little show of reason, that this provision, even as it now stands, renders the bill ineffectual, takes the life-blood out of the whole thing. I do not think, Mr. President, we should aggravate it by requiring a still greater number to assent to the filing of the petition, especially, as I repeat, when we have left the debtor the power, by procuring a majority in number and amount of his creditors, to ask the court to dismiss the whole proceeding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the seventh section of the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the section by striking out in line 47 the words "at least one-third of the debts so provable," and inserting the words "at least $1,000;" so that the clause shall read:

And the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amounts to at least $1,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That makes it worse for the debtor than it now is, a good deal.

Mr. INGALLS. The object of my amendment is to renew the provisions of this section not applicable to debtors whose debts do not exceed the sum of $3,000. My purpose is to have that question again brought before the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Why does the Senator ask to strike out this provision, "at least one-third of the debts so provable?" He will make it much worse for the debtor, because now it may require that the amount there may be $50,000, $100,000, or $500,000. I suppose what the Senator is at is to add after "provable" the words, "and whose debts shall amount to $1,000."

Mr. INGALLS. My purpose is to have the provisions of this section applicable only to the estates of debtors whose obligations exceed $3,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the object will be attained by adding after the word "provable" the words, "and whose debts shall amount to $1,000."

Mr. INGALLS. Well, I will make the motion in that form.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator does not approve of that, I trust.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not; but I do not want the provision as to one-third in amount stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas modifies his amendment, and proposes to insert the words moved by him after the word "provable."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say that this is in substance precisely the question that was debated yesterday at great length upon both sides, and settled by a very decisive majority of the Senate against the amendment. I hope it will be voted down now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOGAN. I have a little amendment that I do not think will provoke any discussion whatever, and one that it seems to me ought to be agreed to by the Judiciary Committee, if it is presumable that they will agree to anything. I move to insert after the word "bankruptcy," in line 42 of the section, the following:

Provided, That the court shall hear the parties and make such examinations as shall, in its opinion, be just in the premises; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court that the party sought to be adjudged a bankrupt has assets in his possession or debts due sufficient to establish his solvency, and the party shall so elect, he shall not be adjudged a bankrupt, but the court may order a stay of proceedings for a period of six months, and a record shall be made of the debts proved or admitted, and if it shall appear at the expiration of the time that any of such debts remain unpaid or unsatisfied with creditors, then the debtor may be declared bankrupt.

I do not desire to say anything. The amendment speaks for itself. I think it is very just and proper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say, not to take up time, that this goes much further than I believe the laws of my friend's own State and all the State stay-laws, because there where they execute a stay-law they require security to be given for the payment of the debt at the end. My friend's amendment does not even do that; but anybody can see that it would not apply to the bankrupt law at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not intend to say anything, but there seems to be such a great aversion here on the part of some gentlemen to State laws that there has to be something said about State laws always in connection with this bankrupt law. Certainly, there is no relation between them. The Senator, however, is mistaken in regard to the laws of Illinois; he may be better posted in regard to the laws of Vermont. I could state what our laws are in reference to stay of proceedings, but it is entirely unnecessary. We have there a right of redemption on the sale of real estate extending to twelve months; but of course rights under the State law are not applicable to this bankrupt law in any way. This proposition merely is that where an attempt is made to put a party in bankruptcy, if the evidence shows that he has plenty of assets to pay his debts, then the proceeding shall be suspended and time given him to pay the debts; and if he fails to make payment of all his debts within this time, then he shall be adjudged a bankrupt. That is all there is to it, giving opportunity to the party to pay his debts; and if not, then he becomes a bankrupt by judgment of the court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One word. My friend from Illinois is so persuasive that I am afraid to let his speech go unanswered. He now puts the man into bankruptcy so that the bankrupt court has jurisdiction of him; that excludes all remedies in the State courts at once and per se, because the acts provide that after the petition is filed in bankruptcy no suit can be brought against him. That being the state of the case, then he proposes that the court shall hang it up for six months, leaving the property in the possession of the debtor, without any security, to do what he pleases with it, without anybody being able to touch him under State law, or any other law; he can go to England with it, or where he likes.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Vermont is so remarkable in his mode and manner of argumentation that he necessarily calls a word from me again. The whole tone of his argument for the last two or three days—and we have certainly listened to him with great pleasure every time he has repeated the speech—has been in opposition to the State laws, and has been an attempt on his part to take the debtor from their crushing and overpowering oppression and put him under the beneficent influence of the national bankrupt law. That has been the argument of the Senator ever since this bill came up. Now he says this amendment would take debtors out of the operation of the State laws and tie them up for six months, the very thing he has been pressing this bill on the Senate for. The very reason he has pressed it so strongly is, that it will take debtors out from the operation of State laws that he considers so injurious to the debtor class. This does it; it prevents a multiplicity of suits under State laws, and suspends action after the jurisdiction of the United States courts is once established over the person and his property. It then suspends further action so that he may pay his debts, if he is an honest man and intends to do so—having sufficient estate to do it, having sufficient property to do it—and if he has not he is adjudged a bankrupt. If he has a sufficiency of property to pay his debts, then the time is extended to give him an opportunity to pay them; and if not, then he becomes a bankrupt, and the court has jurisdiction of his property and person.

Mr. THURMAN. What becomes of the property that he has disposed of within these six months?

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman wants another speech I can answer. I ask for the yeas and nays on this proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CARPENTER. Being upon the floor this moment, I desire to say a very few words upon this bankrupt bill, which I can say at this point as well as any other.

I came here at this session thoroughly resolved to vote for the total repeal of the bankrupt law. On examination of the subject and considering the arguments that have been made pro and con, I am convinced that the repeal of the bankrupt law at present would be most injurious to the debtor class; that they are to-day protected by the existence of the bankrupt law from what would otherwise be a general rush on the part of creditors, each one to secure his preference and his "pound of flesh." I shall, therefore, vote for continuing the bankrupt law with the modifications that may be made at the present session. I shall vote for the amendments that have been recommended by the committee, and I shall vote for such amendments as are offered in the Senate as modified, and ameliorate still further the provisions of the law; but thus amended, or amended as far as it can be in the Senate, I am of opinion that it is better for the country, for the debtor class, that the bankrupt law should be preserved. I shall therefore vote against its repeal, and for the modifications that are proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will not vote for this one, I hope?

Mr. CARPENTER. O, no.

Mr. INGALLS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut not now in his seat, [Mr. FERRY.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Logan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Ramsey, and Spencer—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Cooper, Crozier, Davis, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Stevenson, Stewart, Sumner, Thurman, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Sherman, Sprague, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—33.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PRATT. I am friendly to the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and shall give them my cordial support, and I rise now to offer an amendment in aid of these amendments and not in hostility to them. It is to correct an ambiguity, at least what would be regarded as an ambiguity in some parts of the country, I am afraid, without the amendment which I propose. It is in line 41, on page 7, to insert after the words "commercial paper" the words "governed by the law merchant." Now, in order to explain the propriety of the insertion of these words, I beg leave to say that in some of the Western States there are two kinds of paper: the one, such as bills of exchange, and in my own State notes which are made payable at bank, are governed by the law merchant, an expression which of course is familiar to the lawyers of this body, paper that for non-payment must be protested and notice given to the drawer of the bill and to the indorser, or in the case of a promissory note to the payee and the indorsers of the note. We have another class of paper, and much the most common in our section of the country, where the note is not made payable at a bank, but is made payable to A B, or order, and is indorsed and goes into circulation. As to that kind of paper, the law provides, and the courts have uniformly held, that the maker of the note may set up any set-off, counter-claim, or defense whatever against not only the payee of the note, but against every assignee; whereas under the law merchant, if the paper is transferred before maturity, of course none of the equities of the original parties can be set up against the assignee. I am afraid that as this bill stands at present, the expression "commercial paper" would be regarded as ambiguous. It might be held to include both classes of paper such as I have described in my own State and in other Western States. I propose, therefore, to set this question entirely at rest by describing what is meant by "commercial paper" as that paper which is governed by the law merchant. That is the extent of my amendment, and I hope it will be acceptable to the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be reported so that we may see exactly how it is stated.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, which was to insert in line 41 of section 7, after the word "paper," the words "governed by the law merchant."

Mr. THURMAN. I am aware that it is the law in Indiana that, except the paper of the class mentioned by the Senator, commercial paper made payable at a bank, or bills of exchange, a bona fide purchaser of a note, the indorsee of a note for value, before maturity, stands in no better condition than the maker of the note, and that any defense that could be made by the maker of the note if it had remained in the hands of the payee may be made, although it has been transferred before maturity and for a valuable consideration; but that, I think, is a law that is peculiar to Indiana and a few other States. It is not the general law merchant.

Mr. MORTON. How does the Senator state it?

Mr. THURMAN. As I understand the law in Indiana, it is this: If I give my promissory note payable to A B, or order, sixty days hence—not payable at any bank, but an ordinary promissory note—and the payee sells that note, and indorses it, before maturity, for a valuable consideration, to a person having no knowledge of any defense whatsoever, I may make against that indorsee every defense that I could make if the note had remained in the hands of the payee.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think my colleague intended to state that as being the law.

Mr. PRATT. You may make that defense, although the note be assigned after it falls due.

Mr. THURMAN. So you can everywhere; but you can make that defense in Indiana, although the note was indorsed before due; may you not?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. That is just what I said.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my colleague whether this is not the law: If the note is indorsed after it is due the assignee must take notice of all defenses that existed; and if it is indorsed before it is due, defense may be made against the note in the hands of the assignee by a set-off or counter-claim, if the assignee had notice of it before the assignment?

Mr. THURMAN. That is the commercial law everywhere.

Mr. PRATT. I do not understand that distinction to exist in the State of Indiana in the case of the notes I have described. I understand the law in Indiana to be, in the case put by the Senator, that if a note is not payable at a bank, but is payable to A B, or order, the maker of the note may set up any defense which he has against the payee, against any assignee, without reference to the time when the note is assigned, whether assigned before or after it falls due.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In other words, it has to be made payable at a bank to make it negotiable paper.

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; if it is payable at a bank, it is put on the footing of bills of exchange.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana whether, in his opinion, that is not peculiar to the State of Indiana, so far as commercial paper is concerned?

Mr. PRATT. The law was borrowed from the State of Kentucky, and I presume it is the law of Kentucky at this time.

Mr. WRIGHT. The inquiry I make is, whether it is not peculiar to some States?

Mr. PRATT. Undoubtedly to some of the Western States.

Mr. WRIGHT. And therefore is not commercial law. His amendment is to insert "according to the law merchant." I think if he wants to reach the end he proposes, he should say it shall be "commercial paper according to the statutes of particular States." Then he will reach his point.

Mr. PRATT. What objection is there to the insertion of these words? They make this expression, "commercial paper," explicit, so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Mr. THURMAN. The objection to it, in the first place, is that they do no good. "Governed by the law merchant." What is the law merchant? The law merchant is not a body of statute law; the law merchant is a portion of the common law; and to say that they are governed by the law merchant would except from the operation of this section that kind of paper of which the Senator from Indiana speaks, and which in Kentucky and Indiana is governed by their own peculiar law; for that paper, according to the law merchant, is precisely like paper payable at a bank or like a bill of exchange, and the bona fide indorsee before maturity of that paper takes it free from any equities between the original parties. So that putting in here the words "governed by the law merchant" would make the bankrupt law in Indiana except from its operation notes that were given, not payable at a bank. But if it would have that effect there and in Kentucky, it would not have that effect in the rest of the United States, and then what kind of a "uniform" law of bankruptcy would it be?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the seventh section of the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to offer an amendment. In line 41 of this section, after the words "commercial paper," I move to add the words "in the course of such business."

I offer this amendment because a merchant, broker, trader, or manufacturer very often gives paper that is negotiable in its character, but is not in the line of his business, and because in many of the States there is a species of paper which is not negotiable, or commercial paper according to the law merchant, but is made so by the statutes of particular States. Take my own State, for instance: a single bond is negotiable, and negotiable whether it is made payable to order or not. It may be indorsed, and in that way it becomes commercial paper. If, therefore, a banker in the State of North Carolina should buy a tract of land and give his single bond for $1,000, that would be negotiable paper, and according to the provisions of the amendment to the bankrupt law as here reported, that creditor would be entitled to be counted in the percentage of creditors necessary to put such a banker into bankruptcy.

It may be said that the courts will construe this clause to embrace only paper executed in the course of the business of the banker or merchant, and some courts have so construed it, but other courts and highly respectable courts have construed it otherwise. Therefore I think this provision ought to be inserted in order that there may be no difficulty about it. Hundreds and thousands of persons engaged in the business of banking, &c., have a species of paper that is not in the regular course of their business, and a species of paper that they are not very careful to pay at its maturity. I think it would be unwise to allow a provision in the bankrupt act which would include this paper in making up the percentage of indebtedness necessary to put a party into bankruptcy under this act.

Mr. BOREMAN. I ask the Senator if his amendment would not put it upon the parties to prove that fact in beginning the proceedings? Would it not throw the burden of proof upon the person instituting the proceedings to show that it was in the particular business in which the debtor was engaged?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think there is any difficulty about that; for the person seeking to put any party into bankruptcy must aver in his petition that so much of his commercial paper is overdue, and that it has remained overdue for more than forty days. That is a material averment in his petition; and no difficulty therefore will arise upon the ground suggested by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BOREMAN. The Senator does not seem to get my meaning. "Commercial paper" shows for itself; but the point is that it will have to be proved that it was issued in the particular business in which the party was engaged. That would be a matter of proof.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is a material averment anyhow in the petition. It only makes it necessary to aver in the petition that it was commercial paper, and the additional averment that it was commercial paper in the course of his business.

Mr. BOREMAN. The exhibition of the paper would show that it was commercial paper; but the other would not be a fact to be proven at sight, and might lead to a great deal of litigation. It would be a very difficult matter very frequently to show.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is somewhat difficult on matters of mere judicial regulation and interpretation to be always sure that an amendment which is put in without special study is correct, although I have no doubt the amendment of my friend from North Carolina is well intentioned, and not like some of these other amendments merely intended to try the general strength of the bill. But, as I understand his amendment, it is merely stating what the courts have already settled the construction of this clause in the statute to be. We use in this section the language of the old law, the construction of which has been settled, "not resumed payment of his commercial paper."

The courts have decided that "his commercial paper" is that which must have been incurred by the debtor in his character of banker, merchant, trader, miner, &c. Now, my friend proposes to add "in the course of his business." Whether that would be in that place descriptive of the paper, or descriptive of the resumption of payment, is open to considerable question. It would be quite doubtful which of the two meanings would be attached to this new phrase, whether the resumption of paper must be made in the course of his business, or whether it attaches to the paper as descriptive of the nature of the business in respect of which it was issued or set afloat. Therefore I suggest to my friend, unless he knows the interpretation has been otherwise in his own State or somewhere, that as the interpretation appears, according to the latest notes we have of all the decisions, to have been uniform on that subject and in the direction my friend desires, it would be safer, to avoid a mistake in the judicial interpretation of this clause, to leave it with the law settled as it is.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to correct my honorable friend. If he will look on a little further in the notes he has before him he will find that it has been frequently decided the other way. It has been decided both ways, and by highly respectable judges. Let me state my own objection again; perhaps I can do it in a little plainer terms. A banker purchases from me a tract of land for which he gives me his single bond for $1,000, and the notes are due twelve months from date, and he allows the notes to lie over after they come due more than forty days. As this act stands, and as the words are construed by highly respectable authority, that debt might be counted in the percentage of indebtedness that is necessary to enable creditors to put that banker into bankruptcy. Now, sir, I do not believe it is the purpose of the Senate to make any such provision; and inasmuch as the insertion of these words will put the construction beyond any sort of controversy, it seems to me there can be no objection to the amendment, and especially when these words certainly carry out the construction which the honorable Senator from Vermont says the courts have already adopted, and which some of them have adopted, while others have ruled otherwise. It cannot derange the decisions on this subject heretofore. It only makes plain what was doubtful before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will suggest to my friend an amendment to his, although it is not in order, and with that modification I think I shall have no objection to it, and that is to make it read "not resumed payment of his commercial paper, made or passed in the course of his business." That is, if a man being a merchant takes any paper from his customers, and then indorses it to the man of whom he has bought, of course he is liable as his indorser——

Mr. MERRIMON. I will accept that modification.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But as my friend has it, he refers to "the course of such business" when there is no preceding word of business in that section, which might leave it open to some question as to precisely what was meant. But with the modification to make it read "commercial paper made or passed in the course of his business," I, for one, should have no objection to it, although I am not speaking for the committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. He might be a banker and a farmer too. I suggest that it be made to read "such business." Then the word "such" would refer to his business as merchant, trader, or manufacturer, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "His business as such." I have no objection to that.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well; I am not particular about the phraseology; I only want the idea incorporated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Commercial paper made or passed in the course of his business as such." That would leave it open to no question, and leave the law exactly as it is now.

Mr. MERRIMON. I accept that modification.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Vermont what occurs to me as a possible objection to that language, in connection with the language of the section as it stands. I ask the Clerk to be good enough to report the amendment as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, is to insert after the word "paper," in line 41, the words "made or passed in the course of his business as such."

Mr. WRIGHT. And then the clause goes on, "within the period of forty days." Now, it occurs to me that that will relate to the "forty days" that follow, and not to the "business as such;" so that it will refer to commercial paper made or passed in the course of his business as such within the period of forty days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would depend upon the punctuation.

Mr. THURMAN. It might be put in parentheses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Put it in parentheses, with a comma after it, and there can be no objection to it at all.

Mr. THURMAN. Let a comma be placed after "paper," and then let the amendment be put in parentheses, with a comma after it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the committee's amendment.

Mr. CROZIER. I desire to call the attention of the chairman to another consideration, in my mind, that may arise on this proposed amendment. As the amendment now stands, it is impossible to put a banker, for example, into bankruptcy unless he has failed to resume the payment of his commercial paper. Now, it is a fact that most savings-banks make no commercial paper at all, except occasionally a draft on a New York correspondent. Moneys deposited with them are evidenced by a bank-book or a ticket; something that is not in itself negotiable. They pay what is deposited with them upon a check drawn by the party who makes the deposit. Now, then, under this provision, if it shall be adopted, what is to be done with bankers who issue no commercial paper and are not able to pay their liabilities for the reason that they cannot collect their assets?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a difficulty, if it be one, that has existed in the law all the time. Neither the report of the committee nor the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina touches that question. I should think, if anything, it would be rather improved by this last suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina referring to paper issued in the course of their business as such. If in the course of its business a savings-bank gives a draft on New York, or an order, or a check, and it is payable to order or bearer, to pay its depositors, then that would be in the strictest sense commercial paper by the law merchant; but, of course, if there be a savings-bank or any other bank that sits down with money in its pocket and refuses to pay its depositors, then that refusal does not bring the bank under the head of having suspended commercial paper; that is true.

Mr. CROZIER. But in the case I put, the bank by reason of being unable to collect its debts, without any element of fraud at all, is unable to pay its depositors.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I say. I am not now speaking of fraud; I am only saying that in any case of a bank that has assets receivable, and is supposed, as to its depositors, to have assets on hand ready to pay theoretically, but has not any money in its vaults, and its only obligation is to pay its depositors, like any other bank that has got out money, that does not fall within the description of a refusal to pay commercial paper; that is plain enough. It never has been so supposed; and the only recourse that could be had in that case would be the fact that some legal proceeding would be taken, if it were a national savings-bank, under the act of 1864, which would wind it up in what is an effectual bankruptcy, and perhaps more strictly effectual than this, because its assets are always convertible into money at once at some price, differing from general business; or, if the State law were to apply to it, then a suit brought by a creditor against the bank, to compel the payment of a debt which it owed to one of its depositors, or going for a certain length of time, would enable the creditors, if a third of them in amount and a quarter in number desired it, to put it into bankruptcy, which would fall under the other head.

Mr. CROZIER. The object of my question was to ascertain whether, in the view of the committee in this language, a bank situated in the manner I have stated would be embraced within the provisions of the bankrupt act as proposed to be amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt it would come in, but it would come in where the creditor would be obliged to commence an action at law and attach the property. It would not come under the head of "commercial paper."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understand him to accept this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not accept it. I said, not speaking for the committee, that it was satisfactory to me. I have no right to accept it, of course.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Well, I still desire to ask my friend a question. Does it not always have to be ascertained, in the preliminary proceeding in bankruptcy, although the paper is made by a manufacturer or by a broker, whether he made it in his capacity as manufacturer or broker, or whether it was in some side business or some private arrangement, and that burden is thrown upon the petitioner to show. It seems to me it is a great objection to the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. That is undoubtedly the right interpretation of the law; but, as is stated by the Senator from North Carolina, there have been decisions directly conflicting on that very question, and I have them here before me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not myself understand that the decision to which my friend from North Carolina refers is in conflict with the provisions that I read. I agree that the law is exactly as my friend from New Jersey says, and I so stated it; but then my friend from North Carolina rose and said that if I would look further on I would find that some of the courts had decided otherwise. If they had, then I certainly said I had no objection to making it so clear that they could not help deciding in the way my friend from New Jersey states that the law is. But I do not think these last words in the book to which my friend alludes, although they start with a contra, according to the opinion of Mr. Bump, are in conflict with the preceding decisions to which I referred, because what the clause really means, after all, as you can see, is that the character of the paper is that which it receives in going through the hands of the banker or merchant as such. Now what does it say? "His commercial paper, as applied to one proceeded against in bankruptcy, merely means paper which he is bound to pay without reference to its origin." The "origin" there means without reference to where it comes from, because the case spoken of is an indorsement; for it goes on: "If a banker, &c., has indorsed a note, the indorsement is his." If he received that note and indorsed it over to somebody else, his indorsement was in his character of banker. The origin of that note may have been between private persons, not subject to this clause at all. The report does not show that that was it; but I assume that it was. So that, as between the original parties to the note, it may have been given to the banker by a man who had bought of him a lot of land, if you please; the banker puts it into his assets in his banking business, and in his character of banker he negotiates it at a bank, where he undertook to raise money to speculate in stocks. Then the statement of the decision goes on to say, "If a banker, &c., has indorsed a note, the indorsement is his; and if he has received due notice of dishonor he is liable to pay the note, and if he has thereafter failed to pay it, the failure is his; and this although some one else who was bound to save him harmless has failed to do so, and thus has broken two promises, while the indorser has broken but one. The one is sufficient to establish his failure to meet his obligations."

It may be that if we had the whole case it would support the idea of my friend from North Carolina; but as I understand this syllabus of the writer of this book he is entirely mistaken in putting the word "contra" against it, as being against the general current of decision.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think in passing a statute we ought to be as careful as we can to get the phraseology so as to leave as little difficulty about construing it as possible. That there has been difficulty in construing this clause, as it stands now, there can be no sort of doubt, because there are conflicting decisions. The matter occurred to me the more readily because I have experienced difficulty in my own practice of the very kind that I now point out. I have urged before the court that bonds given for land by a banker or by a trader were not "commercial paper" given by the party in the course of his business, and therefore not embraced by the terms of the statute. The language I now propose to insert only sets that question at rest, and I therefore can see no objection to it. It only makes certain what was before doubtful.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the committee whether, in order to make this amendment so that there shall be no chance of misapprehension or misinterpretation, it would not be better to transpose the language so as to read "or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment within a period of forty days of his commercial paper made or passed," and then have the amendment as proposed by the Senator from North Carolina follow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be much better, to relieve it of all doubt.

Mr. THURMAN. Entirely better.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that the amendment be made as I have just stated.

Mr. THURMAN. That would be right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see no just objection to that.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The amendment to the amendment will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is to make the clause read:

Or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment within a period of forty days of his commercial paper made or passed in the course of his business as such.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The seventh section is still open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is on agreeing to the section.

The section was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is an important blank in this section, to be filled by and by, that Senators may be reflecting upon it as to how far this section shall be retroactive. The committee proposed to leave this blank, because we desired the Senate, as a business question, to determine how it should be filled, and we wish to leave it open with the section agreed to as it is until we have gone through all the amendments and the bill is perfected, and then the Senate can determine on filling the blank.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next section.

The Chief Clerk read section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 40 of said act be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: "And if, on the return-day of the order to show cause as aforesaid, the court shall be satisfied that the requirement of section 39 of said act as to the number and amount of petitioning creditors has been complied with, or if, within the time provided for in section 39 of this act, creditors sufficient in number and amount shall sign such petition so as to make a total of one-fourth in number of the creditors and one-third in the amount of the provable debts against the bankrupt, as provided in said section, the court shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final; otherwise it shall dismiss the proceedings, and, in cases hereafter commenced, with costs."

The section was agreed to.

The ninth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 41 of said act be amended as follows:

After the word "bankruptcy," in line 8, strike out all of said section, and insert the words:

And unless, upon such hearing or trial, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said court, or of the jury, as the case may be, that the facts set forth in said petition are true, or if it shall appear that the debtor has paid and satisfied all liens upon his property, in case the existence of such liens was the sole ground of the proceeding, the proceeding shall be dismissed, and the respondent shall recover costs; and all proceedings in bankruptcy may be discontinued on reasonable notice and hearing, with the approval of the court, and upon the assent, in writing, of such debtor, and not less than one-half of his creditors in number and amount; or, in case all the creditors and such debtor assent thereto, such discontinuance shall be ordered and entered; and all parties shall be remitted, in either case, to the same rights and duties existing at the date of the filing of the petition for bankruptcy, except so far as such estate shall have been already administered and disposed of. And the court shall have power to make all needful orders and decrees to carry the foregoing provision into effect.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to offer an amendment to this section that I trust will meet with the approbation of the committee, by adding after the word "bankruptcy," in line 8 of section 41 of the law, and before the amendment proposed by the committee, the words:

Or, at the election of the debtor, the court shall award a venire facias to the marshal of the district, returnable within ten days before him, for the trial of the facts set forth in the petition, at which time the trial shall be had, unless adjourned for cause.

The chairman of the committee will observe that when the trial is had before the court it is a summary proceeding; but if the trial is to be by jury, if demanded by the debtor, the jury cannot, as the law now stands, be summoned until the next term of the court after the demand is made. What is the practical operation of that? In the State that I represent, and I presume in most of the Western States, there are generally but two terms of the United States district court a year; and if a petition should be filed immediately after the adjournment of one term of court, if the debtor demands a trial by jury, it cannot be had until the succeeding term, and several months may elapse, within which the debtor will remain at the mercy of his creditors, and his property will have been seized by a provisional order of seizure, his business stopped, and his credit dead, and all the mischief possible will have been inflicted upon him. I trust that the amendment will meet with the approbation of the chairman of the committee, as making the provisions of the section symmetrical and harmonious with themselves.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where does the Senator intend those words to come in?

Mr. INGALLS. After the word "bankruptcy," and before the amendment suggested by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will word his amendment "that the court may, in its discretion," say that, so as to make it at the motion of either party, I shall have no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. But as the section now stands it is at the election of the debtor to demand a trial by jury on the facts set forth by the petition, and if the demand is granted, then the trial cannot be had until the term succeeding the time of the demand, whereas if no jury is demanded the hearing is summarily by the court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The argument of my friend is a little specious that it is now at the election of the debtor. It is true that if the debtor demand a jury trial on the question of whether he has committed an act of bankruptcy, as the law now stands, he has a right to a trial by jury. Then it is adjourned into court for the purpose of having that trial. It may be, both to him and to the creditor, a great injury that this space of time should elapse while this dispute is going on and while his property is in the hands of the marshal awaiting a determination. That is one of the things which sometimes produce great expense. Now, my friend is right in saying that there ought to be a provision, and one has been suggested to me which I expect before this bill is through with to offer, though I have not had time to consult the committee about it, that the court may, on application of either party, where a jury trial is awarded, award a venire for a jury and bring a jury in to try the question at a special term, which might save a vast deal of expense in the delay occasioned while the marshal is holding the property. But, according to any of the analogies of judicial proceedings that I know of, you ought not to allow one party to have a jury trial at his election and have the time also at his election. If he demands the right to be tried by jury, which he may under the present law, then it ought to be, I suggest to my friend, in the discretion of the court to determine whether the jury trial, for the interests of both sides, should be had then or had at the term.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me ask the Senator if the allegations are of fraud, or of a suspension of payment of commercial paper, and the debtor desires to traverse such an allegation, and upon that demands a trial by a jury rather than by the courts, would he not be entitled and ought he not to be entitled to receive an immediate trial by a jury, if he so desires, instead of being compelled to wait until the next term of the court after he makes his demand, allowing a period perhaps of several months to intervene, during which his property would be in the custody of the law, his business at an end, and his credit destroyed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I say; but I say, as in all cases where the rights of parties are at stake, the question of when a trial is to be had must be determined by the discretion of the judge. It might be that the creditor would not be ready with his proofs, without his fault, and therefore the judge ought to have it in his discretion, as he does in every case of a suit in court, to determine whether it shall be put off for a week or for a term, as it might be in term. It might be, on the other side, that the debtor was not ready and not blamable for not being ready. So it appears to me that the true provision to make on the topic the Senator is speaking of is, that when the debtor demands a jury trial, the judge, upon the application of either party, if in his judgment it shall be just, may award a venire for a trial to try it on the spot.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment that I have proposed, I think, meets the objection that is urged by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. INGALLS. One moment, if you please. I say I obviate the objection, because in the latter part of my amendment it is provided that the trial shall proceed unless adjourned for cause. Consequently if the creditor is not ready to proceed with his proof or the debtor not ready to proceed with his, then upon the proper affidavits or showing being made, the court, in its discretion, may adjourn the hearing until the parties are ready with their proof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly true; but that is not my point. My point is that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas gives to the debtor, after he has been put into bankruptcy——

Mr. INGALLS. Not after he has been put in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After the petition has been filed. That is what I call getting in, so that it begins to trouble him; I am not speaking of the adjudication.

Mr. INGALLS. He wants to get out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But after he is drawn into the bankrupt court, if that expression suits my friend better, it gives him an election to have a jury trial, subject to a postponement at once; but be the case ever so pressing, on the other side; be his fraud ever so gross and palpable, he may be so malicious and ugly as to say, "I would rather have my property eaten up; I will make all you creditors wait until the end of the next term before you can have this properly proceeded with." Now I say it is in accordance with all just proceedings that the right of one party, when a jury trial is demanded, ought to be exactly the right of the other one in respect to time; and hence we ought to say that the court, on the demand of a jury trial, may award a venire for a jury at once in its discretion, or sooner, on the motion of either party.

Mr. INGALLS. It seems to me that the Senator forgets that these proceedings are hostile to the debtor, and that he is an unwilling party. I cannot understand the force of the Senator's argument that when an application is made by the creditors themselves, who ought to be prepared with their proof to make their allegations good, when they come into court to obtain the advantages of the law so far as they are concerned, they should still have the option to press the debtor further by postponing his trial until a subsequent term of court.

Mr. THURMAN. Let me ask the Senator a question. The objection to his amendment is that it is positive and mandatory, that the court shall issue a venire facias for a jury to appear within ten days. The application may be upon the very last day of the term of the court. How is it to be complied with? There may be very good reasons why it cannot be, because the parties cannot be ready, or the court has other business. So you ought not to make it absolutely mandatory that a venire facias shall go out for a jury within ten days. Change the word "shall" in the amendment to the word "may;" say the court may award a venire facias for a jury, and I do not then see any objection to it; but do not take away all discretion from the court. Just change the word "shall" to "may."

Mr. WRIGHT. It occurs to me that this amendment is certainly objectionable, for a reason that I can point out. As the law stands in connection with the proposed amendment of the committee, this party, if in term time, would be entitled to a jury trial if he asked it; but the object of the proposed amendment is to provide for a jury trial between the regular terms of the court. It provides, "or at the election of the debtor the court shall award a venire facias to the marshal of the district, returnable within ten days." Now, suppose that a regular term of the court shall be within fifteen or twenty days after such an application is made, and the court shall see that no prejudice would be worked to any party by letting the matter remain until the regular term, what reason is there to give the party at his own election a right to demand a jury trial within ten days, with all the expense of a new venire, with all the expense of the attendance of jurors, when, perhaps, before you close the trial that is provided for in this amendment the regular term will come on with the regular jurors and then you save expense? It seems to me that is sufficient answer.

The suggestion made by the chairman of the committee that you shall leave it to the option of the court to determine whether there shall be a trial between terms, is all that can reasonably be asked. But if you say that the debtor shall at his election have a right to demand a jury trial, it seems to me that frequently you would pile up costs on the parties quite unnecessarily, and the court would have no discretion to say, "This matter shall wait until the regular term."

I think if the Senator from Kansas will adopt the suggestion that has been made by the chairman and the Senator from Ohio he will meet everything that he asks. I know he may answer that the creditors may come in and ask that the party be put into bankruptcy, and that they ought to be prepared at all times to prove their case. The same thing might be said of a person who sues a debtor in an ordinary action, "You have sued him, and you must be prepared at all times to prove your case." Not so. He is entitled to the same rule for continuance and preparation that the debtor is.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I should like to call his attention to the fact that every other provision of the section to which this amendment is proposed is mandatory and not permissive. It provides that—

> On such return day or adjourned day, if the notice has been duly served or published, or shall be waived by the appearance and consent of the debtor, the court shall proceed summarily to hear the allegations of the petitioner and debtor, and may adjourn the proceedings from time to time on good cause shown, and shall—

The discretion is only about the adjournment of the hearing to suit the necessities of proof—> and shall, if the debtor on the same day so demand in writing, order a trial by jury at the first term of the court at which a jury shall be in attendance, to ascertain the fact of such alleged bankruptcy.

That is to say, unless a jury is demanded the proceedings shall be summarily disposed of by the court. If a jury is demanded, then the debtor, if the term of court is at a considerable distance from the time the demand is made, is compelled to await the arrival of that time, subject to all the detriment that he has been exposed to by the initiation of the proceedings, before he can have a determination of the cause. If he is a dishonest debtor and desires to postpone proceedings, this will be satisfactory to him as it now stands; but if he is an honest debtor, conscious that the allegations made against him, upon hearing, will be disproved, then I submit he certainly ought to have a right to an immediate hearing by a jury, if he so desires. I can see no reason why that right is not one that he would be entitled to under the constitutional provision, for an immediate trial by jury is within the terms of that portion of the Bill of Rights.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to take two minutes, or less, to reply. I should have, perhaps, a little more faith in the amendment of my friend from Kansas if we did not all perfectly well understand that he is opposed to the whole thing——

Mr. INGALLS. I trust the Senator does not intend to do me injustice in that matter. I am certainly not opposed to the whole thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. INGALLS. I am opposed to what I conceive to be invidious and odious discriminations in the law; but I am the friend of a bankrupt law constituted as I believe it should be, in the benefit of both parties and the whole commercial community.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly; but I had not had any reason to understand that my friend was in favor of this bankrupt law or any part of it that the committee have reported, for he has certainly steadily voted against us, I believe, every time. I do not do him injustice in that.

Mr. INGALLS. I have steadily voted against the committee in connection with the amendments they have suggested upon the clause in regard to commercial paper, in which the gentlemen have claimed to be exclusive friends of the debtor class of this country; and I may say here, in passing and as an end of the matter, that I conceive that they are in a wrong position in claiming that they are solely the friends of the debtor class. In my judgment, if that provision is friendly to the debtor class, it is in very suspicious company, to say the least, and, to use a very expressive phrase, I think it has "wool in its teeth."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand the phrase of "wool in the teeth," and therefore I cannot reply to that part of my friend's speech. Certainly, if I have done him injustice in supposing that he intended to vote against this bill and to kill it if he could, and to pass the House bill, I should be glad to make the apology; but I do not hear anything from his lips that leads me to suppose that I have misunderstood his position.

Now I come to the point at issue. While I do not complain of my friend at all, it is a part of perfectly fair parliamentary tactics to make a bill so bad, if you can, that its own friends have to abandon it and let it drop. Therefore if my friend wishes to have the original bill pass as it came from the House, an absolute repeal of the law, he is doing perfectly right, according to his own sense of what is fair, and what is parliamentarily fair, to get in some provision which will look so unseemly when it is done, or will work in some way such an injustice when it is done, that everybody will say, "This is wrong." Now, he undertakes to say, in answer to my friend from Iowa, that the existing law gives the debtor the same right to have a summary trial. His point is, you will observe, that the court, on his election, the moment the proceedings are brought up, shall award a jury trial, and shall proceed to hear and determine the case at the end of ten days. That is not the course of practice in any other cause, either in Kansas or anywhere else. Any plaintiff may bring a suit, complaining of the non-performance of promises or of any wrong, and when the cause is entered in court it is at the discretion of the judge, and not at the will of the plaintiff, or defendant either, when, according to the course of justice, their rights shall be brought to a determination before a jury. There is where the bite comes in. It does not happen to be in the existing law. My friend reads properly when he reads that "the court shall proceed summarily to hear the allegations of the petitioner and debtor." If he had stopped there he would have had a precedent for his claim that the court shall have a jury and shall try the cause, if the debtor desires it, within ten days.

Mr. INGALLS. "Summarily" means without jury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it happens to say afterward, and in the very next consecutive words, "summarily to hear the allegations of the petitioner and debtor, and may adjourn the proceedings from time to time on good cause shown."

Now, if the honorable Senator is perfectly sincere as desiring to make this bill perfect and just, if it is to pass, although he means to vote against it in the end, then it would be proper for him to say in this amendment, if it is desirable at all, which is very questionable, as my friend from Iowa has shown, that the court may on the appplication of the debtor summon a jury in this way, and may adjourn the proceeding before the jury on good cause shown, just as it is in every court in the world that professes to proceed upon the principles of justice.

But my friend does not leave it there, and after this discussion it is evident that he does not intend to leave it there. He intends to put it in the power of the person who is brought up before the judge to compel a summary hearing by jury, no matter how clear the probability may be that he is in the wrong and is dishonest; no matter how many affidavits may be filed on the part of the whole body of his creditors, showing that with a reasonable delay they can produce the proofs which will convict him of having concealed and covered up his property. It is equivalent to saying that if a man were indicted for murder in a court, if you please, he should have a trial in the first ten days of the court, hit or miss, whether the prosecution or the people get their witnesses there within that time or not.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator do me the favor to read the last line or two of my proposed amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; I will read the whole of it:

Or at the election of the debtor the court shall award a venire facias to the marshal of the district, returnable within ten days before him for the trial of the facts set forth in the petition, at which time the trial shall be had unless adjourned for cause.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not that remove the objection the Senator urges? Does not the discretion still remain in the court to adjourn the hearing for cause, if that cause is shown by either party?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it does not; unless the section is entirely imperfect, because the adjournment here is after you have once brought up your jury and have opened your cause; here this right to adjourn is after you have got your jury in. How does it comport with the transaction of judicial proceedings, when you have selected the twelve men who are to try your cause, to turn them loose over the country from week to week, from month to month, to be operated on by the dishonesty of creditors or by the dishonesty of the bankrupt, as the case may be, in order that a corrupt verdict may be obtained? The theory, I submit to my friend, of a jury trial is that when you have impaneled a jury, if you are ever going to try the cause by that jury, you are to keep on with it day by day until the matter can be disposed of. I submit to my friend with some confidence that he will agree with me, therefore, that it is injurious to the interest of all parties that you are to summon a jury and then determine after you have got your jury whether the case shall be postponed. If the language "shall be adjourned for cause on application of the debtor" were changed to "unless for cause the judge shall think he ought to postpone the time of trial before the jury is summoned," or something equivalent, then it comes to the suggestion of my friend from Iowa that it ought to be left to the discretion of the court whether he will award a jury or not. He may say, "I will not award one to-day, Mr. Debtor, because it appears to me plain that the evidence is not ready which affidavits show may be produced; but I will let these proceedings stand over for ten days and then I will award a jury, to be summoned in the proper time and all parties shall be ready for trial." But my friend from Kansas puts his adjournment for cause after the jury is impaneled and sworn, and leaves the thing to haggle along at enormous expense in keeping the jury together constantly for a month, perhaps for two months. It may be that the debtor is an Englishman, living in London, and you are obliged to go across the ocean to get your testimony to show that he has committed a fraud on his American creditors. And where do you find yourself? Eaten up with the expense of a jury, exposed to corruption on both sides, or else you have to discharge that jury, which this amendment does not provide for, and begin again.

I submit to my friend that the committee would have no serious objection to his amendment if he would leave it to the discretion of the court on the application of the debtor to award this jury. Then the court can adjourn the time of awarding it until the parties shall be ready.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the ninth section of the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCOTT. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the ninth section as a new section:

That section 11 of said act be amended by inserting the words "and valuation" after the word "inventory," in the twenty-first line; and that section 42 of said act be amended by inserting the words "and valuation" after the word "inventory," in the fifteenth line.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not consulted with the committee, but I had supposed that in the course of proceedings in bankruptcy, when these two inventories which are spoken of are made, the valuation of the assets is always put in. Certainly, for one, I have no objection to its being inserted in the law to make it clear.

Mr. SCOTT. The purpose is simply this: The eleventh section relates to voluntary proceedings; the forty-second to involuntary. In both an inventory is required, but at present no valuation is required in either; and the purpose of the amendment which I offer is simply to require a valuation to be made by the debtor in both cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Did I understand the Senator from Vermont to say that the amendment I offered would be agreeable to him if the word "shall" were changed to "may?" I am exceedingly anxious to have that provision in some way incorporated in the section, because it was offered in good faith for the purpose of obviating what I conceive to be a very serious objection to the law as it stands now; and being desirous of obtaining the best terms possible, if it is not acceptable to the committee in the form that I offered, I should prefer to have it in the modified form suggested by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to having it in this way. Let it come in after the word "words," on line 4 of this section, page 10 of the print:

At the election of the debtor the court may, in its discretion, award a venire facias to the marshal of the district, returnable in ten days before him, for the trial of the facts set forth in the petition, at which time the trial shall be had, unless adjourned for cause.

That gives the court discretion to postpone the application. The committee had no objection to it in that form. We certainly do not desire to be captious with any gentleman who offers an amendment which is worth having.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us agree to the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment offered to the ninth section, the question is on the section.

The section was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next section will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The tenth is the composition section, which has once been read to the Senate, and to which I have heard no criticism made at all. It is not, perhaps, necessary that the Secretary should read it again, unless some gentleman should desire it. I have heard no suggestion of objection or change as to any part of the composition scheme.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the intention of the committee in regard to the blanks left in line 17 of that section?

Mr. EDMUNDS. To submit them to the Senate, as we left the other blanks. We propose to leave the Senate, as a business question, to determine what should be the fraction inserted. We propose to go through with the text of the amendments, so to speak, get them all perfected, and then to recall the attention of the Senate, in Committee of the Whole or otherwise, to the filling of the blanks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This section, having been read, will not be read again unless called for by some Senator. The question is on the tenth section.

The section was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next section.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That from and after the passage of this act the fees, commissions, charges, and allowances, excepting actual and necessary disbursements, of, and to be made by, the officers, agents, marshals, messengers, assignees, and registers in cases of bankruptcy, shall be reduced to one-half of the fees, commissions, charges, and allowances heretofore provided for or made in like cases: Provided, That this section shall be and remain in force until the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States shall make and promulgate new rules and regulations in respect to the matters aforesaid, under the powers conferred upon them by sections 10 and 47 of said act, and no longer. And said justices shall have power under said sections, by general regulations, to simplify and consolidate the duties, so far as in their judgment will conduce to the benefit of creditors, of the register, assignee, marshal, and clerk, to the end that prolixity, delay, and unnecessary expense may be avoided.

And no register or clerk of court, or any partner or clerk of such register or clerk of court, or any person having any interest with either in any fees or emoluments in bankruptcy, or with whom such register or clerk of court shall have any interest in respect to any matter in bankruptcy, shall be of counsel, solicitor, or attorney, either in or out of court, in any suit or matter pending in bankruptcy in either the circuit or district court of his district, or in an appeal therefrom. Nor shall they, or either of them, be executor, administrator, guardian, commissioner, appraiser, divider, or assignee of or upon any estate within the jurisdiction of either of said courts of bankruptcy; nor be interested, directly or indirectly, in the fees or emoluments arising from either of said trusts.

And the last clause but one in section 4 of said act is hereby repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before that is voted upon I wish to change the phraseology in one place. In line 14 I move to strike out the words "consolidate the duties," and insert them after the word "creditors," in line 16, so that it will read:

Simplify and, so far as in their judgment will conduce to the benefit of creditors, to consolidate the duties of the register, assignee, marshal, and clerk, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then after the word "clerk," in line 16, I wish to add, "and to reduce fees, costs, and charges," so as to repeat the obligation imposed upon the court, in their general regulations, when they come to consolidating these duties, also to provide for reducing the fees, costs, and charges in that connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be regarded as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then in order to carry out the provisions of this section, as has been suggested by some of the judges themselves, it is desirable to add at the end of line 18, after the word "avoided," the words:

And the words "except such as are established by this act or by law," in section 10 of the said act, are hereby repealed.

Section 10 of the original bankrupt act fixes a certain schedule of fees for some of the officers, which, in some of the districts where there are a great many cases, are evidently too high, and they can be properly reduced. Then, when the words "established by law" are referred to, the court has found itself tied up by the act of 1853 as to the fees of clerks, and in some instances of marshals under the old fee-bill. The object of this amendment, which does not come strictly from the committee, because I have not had an opportunity to consult with them about it, is to enable the Supreme Court judges to revise this whole question of fees and charges, without any limitation for the present except their judgment and the first part of this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. These amendments will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest to my friend, the chairman, one query that occurs to me in connection with the section now before us. I do not know but that the amendments which he has offered and which have been agreed upon may obviate the difficulty in my mind. I was not able to understand them very well as he offered them.

This section provides that the fees of these several officers shall be reduced one-half absolutely. That is the provision of the first part of the section. Then it provides that this section shall be and remain in force until the justices of the Supreme Court shall make certain "rules and regulations in respect to matters aforesaid under the powers conferred upon them by section 10 of the original act, and no longer." Now, the inquiry I suggest is this: Suppose they shall make these rules, and in making them they shall not touch upon this subject of fees, then the result would be that we should be remitted to the fees as they stand by the present law, as I understand the language of the section. I do not think that that was the intention of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it will bear that construction; but it can be obviated in a moment in line 8 by striking out the words "this section," and putting in the words "preceding provision," so that the preceding provision shall remain in force until the new rules shall be promulgated by the court in reference to "the matters aforesaid," which are fees, expenses, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT. The doubt in my mind is, whether they are bound to rearrange such system of fees under this language, being a power "to make and promulgate new rules and regulations."

Mr. EDMUNDS. You think it ought to be mandatory?

Mr. WRIGHT. I think it ought to be mandatory, and it ought to be mandatory upon them to make such rules and regulations touching fees.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Touching the matters aforesaid" certainly includes fees, because that is the chief subject of the first paragraph.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But they might make rules touching them without establishing a fee-list. That is the idea, I suppose.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the idea.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will take any amendment of my friend, then.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was not prepared with any amendment; I only called the attention of my friend to the point. The section can be passed for the present, and when the bill comes into the Senate we can amend it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can fix it in a moment. I move to amend the section further by striking out in line 8 the words "this section," and inserting "preceding provisions," and then by inserting after the word "longer," in line 12, the words "which duties they shall perform as soon as may be." That imposes upon them the positive duty of rearranging the subject of fees.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know but that that may meet the case. I make no objection to the amendment at present, but reserve the right, when I come to examine the section more carefully, to suggest any further amendment that may be necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the section as amended.

The section as amended was agreed to.

The twelfth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 12. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The section was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks the consent of the Senate to make a motion at this time that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. SARGENT. I object. I wish to remind the Senate that not one of the appropriation bills has passed yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator objects, the motion can be entertained only by postponing the present bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to remark simply that there are thirteen appropriation bills to be passed upon by the Senate. These bills will require the attention of the Senate on an average four days each—some of them a great deal more than that; but certainly that is not a high average. That will take fifty-two actual days of session, or over two months. We have not touched one of them yet. I have been endeavoring to procure the attention of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill, up to this time without success, though I hope to have some success in the first part of next week. It seems to me that to-morrow the Senate might meet and give a day to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion being objected to, it is not debatable now.

Mr. SARGENT. I will not make objection to its consideration, but I hope the Senate will not agree to the motion, and I state these reasons why the motion should not be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, on coming into the Senate a moment ago I learned that my name had been associated with the committee appointed to investigate the affairs of this District, and I rise to ask the Senate to excuse me from that duty. As one reason why I should not be expected to perform further duty of that kind, I will say that during the Forty-second Congress I was constantly upon such a committee. I was engaged upon this class of committees during that entire Congress, and at the last session of Congress upon one which I think the Senate will agree with me was sufficiently onerous, and delicate, and embarrassing, to excuse me from any additional duty in that direction

But, Mr. President, a better reason, and one which I think the Senate will agree with me ought to be conclusive, is this: I am now on three committees, all of which are important, but one of them is so exacting that it is out of the question for me, if the Senate hold me to the performance of my duty upon it, to give attention to any other committee, and the acceptance of this would necessarily involve the resignation of that duty. I therefore ask the Senate to excuse me from service on this committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The Senator from Maine asks to be excused from service on the committee to which he has alluded. Will the Senate excuse him?

The question being put, Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, was excused.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will inquire of the Chair if it is in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the House resolution for the organization of a committee of investigation of the affairs of this District. It seems to me, with the difficulties we have before us about it, that the House committee of investigation already ordered is sufficient. Is it too late to enter a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate concurring in that resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It is not too late. Does the Senator desire to enter the motion, or does he wish to have it acted upon now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Can I enter it to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To-day is the last day on which such a motion can be entered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will enter it now for the purpose of facilitating business. In entering the motion I desire simply to say that, considering the difficulties that exist in organizing this committee, I believe it would be wiser and more in accordance with the Constitution to have this committee of investigation to stand and act as a House committee. A committee of five can pursue the investigation with just as much thoroughness as a committee of eight; and I see no reason in the world why the Senate should join in a committee of investigation of this kind. But for the purpose of reserving my opinion on the question, because I do not want to act without the general desire of the Senate, I will simply enter the motion to reconsider and let it stand over until Monday. If we should reconsider our action, as a matter of course that would allow the committee of investigation to stand as it is appointed by the House of Representatives.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That Willis N. Arnold have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That Mary E. Lewis have leave to withdraw her papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Minerva Tilley be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that the following order be made:

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mrs. Alme D. Brooks be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. SPENCER. There has been an adverse report, but she desires to withdraw the papers, as they contain the record of her husband. She has given up the case.

Mr. SCOTT. Then copies should be retained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be made and copies of the papers will be retained.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 4th instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 89) in relation to the lines of telegraph connecting the Capitol with the various Departments of the Government.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on substituting the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which has been gone through with section by section, for the House bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I wish to insert a section after section 1 of the amendment, as section 2, so that the numbering will have to be changed by the Clerk:

That section 2 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended, by striking out in line 10 the words "the same," and inserting the word "any."

The point of that has already been suggested in the debate, and that is the doubt whether the circuit court of the United States in any other district than the one where the bankruptcy proceeding is pending can have jurisdiction of a suit by or against the assignee with an adversary person touching the bankrupt's property. Some courts have held they can, and others that they cannot. I think the plain language of the present law imports by the use of the word "same," which does not necessarily mean the district where the bankruptcy is being carried on, that it is necessary to the interest of the estate that the circuit court of the United States should have this jurisdiction in any circuit where it is necessary to bring suit. The object of this amendment is to make that clear.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have another amendment, which comes in after the old section 2, and in the middle of that same section, after the word "punishment," in line 39, and before the words "or any settlement," coming in as a separate paragraph in the section already agreed to:

That the assignee shall report under oath to the court, at least as often as once in three months, the condition of the estate in his charge, the state of his accounts in detail, and at all other times when the court, on motion or otherwise, shall think fit.

There does not appear to be now any provision requiring an assignee at certain stated times to report to the court what he is about, and how much money he has collected. I am sure there will be no objection to this provision. It is a very important one, I think, suggested by my friend from North Carolina.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I offer, as what will be finally section 3 in the proper arrangement of numbers, a provision suggested by a difficulty proposed by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] as to the enormous expense under the existing phraseology of the law of sending personal notice where there is a vast number of very small creditors whose interests are not enough to make them of the least consequence. He mentioned a case in the State of Maine where a newspaper establishment failed and went into bankruptcy, and it had several thousand subscribers. The law does not authorize the judge in such a case to make a publication to those people alone, but he must send notice to them; and it was found that about one-fourth of the estate, which was a small one, would be eaten up in sending those notices to the various persons, with the legal fees. Therefore I propose, with the assent of such gentlemen of the committee as I have been able to consult, the following amendment, which, with your permission, I will read:

That section 11 of said act be amended by adding after the word "specifies," in line 35—

Which relates to a publication he may make specified in the warrant—

the words: "But whenever the creditors of a bankrupt are so numerous as to make any notice now required by law, to be sent to them, by mail or otherwise, a great and disproportionate expense to the estate, the court may in lieu thereof, in its discretion, order such notice to be given by publication in a newspaper or newspapers, to all such creditors whose claims as reported do not exceed the sums, respectively, of fifty dollars."

I presume no gentleman will object to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is one other amendment, which will be section 4 when the bill is readjusted:

That the first clause of section 20 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

Or in cases of compulsory bankruptcy, after the act of bankruptcy upon or in respect to which the adjudication shall be made, or with a view to making such set-off.

This is an amendment of substance, to which I ask the attention of all Senators, as it has not been brought before to their notice. As the law now stands any debtor of a bankrupt may set off against the claim which the bankrupt may have against him when the estate comes to be settled any debt that he has against the bankrupt. That is right. The law also provides that he may set off any debt or claim that he has at the time the petition is filed. Now, in cases of compulsory bankruptcy the petition is filed by the creditors. While a man is trying to get righted before the petition is filed, during this space of forty days of which we have been speaking, some sharp debtor of the bankrupt, who owes him a very large sum of money, runs around and buys up the claims of other creditors against the debtor at a great discount, and then when the debtor is forced into bankruptcy at last, perhaps by this very same man or his assistants, he brings in to pay his debt of $50,000 that he owes the bankrupt this offset of the claims he has bought for that purpose, upon which he may not have given more than twenty-five cents on the dollar, really cheating the other creditors out of the equality which they were entitled to.

It was thought upon consideration by such gentlemen of the committee as I was able to consult about it that the true limitation in this case of compulsory bankruptcy would be that he should not buy up debts to make offsets against the bankrupt's assets, in other words offsets against the other creditors, after the act of bankruptcy had been committed upon which the man was put in, when he did it not in the course of trade as buying a promissory note that came to his bank, but when he did it for the purpose of making an offset in favor of himself of the debt that he owed, which of course would entirely overturn the equality of division which should exist among creditors; because it might happen, and often has where these abuses have been called to my attention, that some sharp debtor of the bankrupt who owed him a large sum of money, as soon as the man was discredited and still before the petition was filed by the petitioning creditors, would buy up a lot of claims at an enormous discount, and thus in effect show that the estate had no assets at all if he happened to be the chief debtor.

The object, therefore, is to induce fair play and justice between the respective creditors, after the man has got in the condition where the bankrupt law may take hold of him; in other words, it is to prevent fraud.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have one more amendment, which I am sure everybody will agree to; and I will explain it in a single word. It is a final provision, so that when hereafter, if this bill should become a law, we are to again consider the effect and working of bankrupt laws we shall have some specific data to go upon. I have therefore framed a section which provides that the marshal, the assignee, and the register, shall, every year, report to the clerk of the court all the cases that have gone through their hands, in a tabular form, with a statement of how much the assets were, how much has been realized, what has been disposed of, what their fees have been in gross, and under particular classifications how much their expenses have been; in other words, all information which is necessary to a just consideration of the effect of the law. And then I have provided that the clerk shall himself make a similar statement of his operations, and send them all to the office of the Department of Justice. This course has been pursued in Great Britain, and with very great advantage in respect to the administration of the law.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether, in any of the amendments reported by the committee, any provision is made for the reduction of the fees and charges of the officers and agents of the courts in bankruptcy cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; the last section in the print but one provides for a temporary reduction, as the House did, reducing fees one-half, and then that the Supreme Court shall readjust the scale of fees.

Mr. PRATT. That is all right. That escaped my observation.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment; which was to insert after section eleven the following:

That it shall be the duty of the marshal of each district, in the month of July of each year, to report to the clerk of the district court of such district, in a tabular form to be prescribed by the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as such other or further information as may be required by such justices, first, the number of cases in bankruptcy in which the warrant prescribed in section 11 of said act has come to his hands during the year ending June 30 preceding; second, how many such warrants were returned, with the fees, costs, expenses, and emoluments thereof, respectively and separately; third, the total amount of all other fees, costs, expenses, and emoluments, respectively and separately, earned or received by him during such year from or in respect of any matter in bankruptcy; fourth, a summarized statement of such fees, costs, and emoluments, exclusive of actual disbursements in bankruptcy, received or earned for such year; fifth, a summarized statement of all actual disbursement in such cases for such year.

And in like manner every register shall in the same month and for the same year make a report to such clerk of, first, the number of voluntary cases in bankruptcy coming before him during said year; second, the amount of assets and liabilities, as nearly as may be, of the bankrupt; third, the amount and rate per cent. of all dividends declared; fourth, the disposition of all such cases; fifth, the number of compulsory cases in bankruptcy coming before him in the same way; sixth, the amount of assets and liabilities, as nearly as may be, of such bankrupts; seventh, the disposition of all such cases; eighth, the amount and rate per cent. of all dividends declared in such cases; ninth, the total amount of fees, charges, costs, and emoluments of every sort, received or earned by such registers during said year in each class of cases above stated.

In like manner every assignee shall, during said month, make like return to such clerk of, first, the number of voluntary and compulsory cases respectively and separately, in his charge during said year; second, the amount of assets and liabilities therein respectively and separately; third, the total receipts and disbursements therein respectively and separately; fourth, the amount of dividends paid or declared and the rates per cent. thereof in each case respectively and separately; fifth, the total amount of all his fees, charges, and emoluments of every kind therein earned or received; sixth, the total amount of expenses incurred by him for legal proceedings and counsel fees; seventh, the disposition of the cases respectively; eighth, a summarized statement of both classes as aforesaid.

And, in like manner, the clerk of said court, in the month of August in each year, shall make up a statement for such year ending June 30, first, of all cases in bankruptcy pending at the beginning of said year; second, of all such cases disposed of; third, of all dividends declared therein; fourth, the number of reports made from each assignee therein; fifth, the disposition of all such cases; sixth, the number of assignees' accounts filed and settled; seventh, whether any marshal, register, or assignee, has failed to make and file with such clerk the reports by this act required; and if any have failed to make such reports, their respective names and residences; and such clerk shall report in respect of all cases begun during said year, and he shall make a classified statement in tabular form of all his fees, charges, costs, and emoluments, respectively, earned or accrued during said year, giving each head under which the same accrued, and also the sum of all moneys paid into and disbursed out of court in bankruptcy, and the balances on hand or on deposit.

And all the statements and reports herein required shall be under oath and signed by the persons respectively making the same; and said clerks shall, in said month of August, transmit every such statement and report so filed with him, together with his own statement and report aforesaid, to the Attorney-General of the United States.

Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall, on motion made under the direction of the Attorney-General, be, by the district court, dismissed from his office, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I now move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the office of register in bankruptcy is hereby abolished, and the several district courts shall make such orders and take such steps as may be necessary to adjudicate and dispose of all suits, matters, or proceedings in bankruptcy now pending before such registers. The several district courts shall have power, where it may appear to be necessary or advisable, to appoint special master-commissioners to perform any of the duties heretofore performed by registers; and this power may also be exercised by a judge of said courts at chambers. No fees or compensation shall be paid to any such commissioner except such as shall be allowed by the court upon consideration of his bill; and no such fees or compensation shall in any case exceed the amount heretofore allowed for like services.

Mr. President, this is a very important amendment, and I hope Senators will give it their attention. It proposes to abolish that machinery known as registers in bankruptcy; which is a kind of court that decides now in nearly all bankrupt cases the great majority of questions that arise. It is a court that, in the opinion of some of the most eminent judges of the country, may well be abolished; and if it were abolished, the duties which are now discharged by these registers, or the greater part of them, would be discharged by the district judges themselves, who ought to discharge them. It is believed that in at least three-fourths, perhaps four-fifths, of the districts in the United States the judges have ample time and time to spare to discharge all the duties which would devolve upon them if these registers were abolished. But if there should be some necessity in a particular case for some such agency as a master-commissioner, to take proofs, or to audit claims or accounts, or the like, as we know there will be, for the ease of the parties who may live at a distance from the place where the court sits, or because of the nature of the account to be taken, or because the duty is simply ministerial, in all such cases the amendment would leave to the court the power which a court of equity now exercises, to appoint a special master-commissioner. Then the provision that his bill for services must be rendered to the court and taxed and audited by the court, and not paid until it has received the express approbation of the court, it seems to me would be a great protection against exorbitant charges or wasting of the estate.

I know that it will be said that the dispersion of these registers throughout the country, one in each congressional district, as I believe there is now, is a certain convenience to those who have business to transact in bankrupt cases, and that to some extent is true; but when we consider how cumbrous that machinery is, how it tends to prevent the adjudication by that tribunal which ought to adjudicate the questions in bankruptcy—the district court—and when we consider the complaints that are made, with more or less reason, of exorbitant charges and wasting of estates, especially by the per diem charges of registers, it seems to me, and in that I have the support, as I stated, of some of the most eminent judges that we have, the best way is to abolish them out and out. I think that will do more to reduce the cost of bankrupt proceedings than perhaps any other amendment of the bankrupt law that we could make, while I do not think it would destroy the efficiency of the law in the least.

The great recommendation of it, in my mind, is that it makes the court decide in every case whether there is any necessity for a master-commissioner or register, and deciding upon that particular case the court will not appoint a master-commissioner unless it is necessary to appoint one, and if the appointment shall be made, then all his costs and charges must be under the direct supervision of the court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This amendment opens a wider field, which perhaps does not always exactly belong to bankruptcy, because it may be said, possibly, by those who do not know the entire candor of my friend's mind as I do, that as these registers have been put in all over the country rather under republican auspices, it is a good way to get rid of a few staunch and staid and respectable republicans in the various districts who now hold office.

Mr. THURMAN. Are you trying to rally the republicans in the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; I am not trying to rally the republicans. I am trying to show that this question is not necessarily, in all its aspects, connected with the bankrupt bill; and therefore, as my friend, perhaps, like all the rest of us, may have some prejudices of which he is not himself entirely aware, it is just possible to imagine that his usually well-balanced mind is getting a little off the track on this question.

Mr. THURMAN. I never thought of it in that light.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have said that my friend had, I presumed, never thought of it; but I merely put it that I supposed, like all the rest of us, he might have a prejudice of which he was unconscious. If that is putting it too strong, like the rest of the bankrupt law, I will let down a little; but I think not.

Mr. THURMAN. To vindicate the truth of history I will say that these registers were appointed by the late Chief Justice at a time when it is possible the late Chief Justice would have taken a nomination from the democratic convention for the Presidency, and I should not be a bit surprised, although I do not know the politics of a single register in the whole United States, if the democrats had a pretty fair share of those fellows. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be. There is very little of that sort of thing going that the democrats do not have a pretty fair share of. [Laughter.] But if these registers were appointed by somebody who then would have accepted a nomination from a democratic convention for the Presidency, I might say to my friend that anybody will accept a democratic nomination for the Presidency if he is sure he can be elected. I do not know but that I would myself. [Laughter.] But I should not administer the Government exactly upon what are now known as democratic principles, I must tell my friend. The difficulty about these democratic candidates is the difficulty that lies at home with the people about electing those who are nominated.

But let us pass that by and come to the real question, the business question, as far as it has to do with this bill, although I am too tired to say much about that. I will say, in the first place, that on this identical question the committee had the fullest consideration and consultation, and my friend's proposition, I think, received as kind treatment there as its merits deserved, and was rejected.

You will see, Mr. President, that we have provided now, and, I think, with the acceptance of all sides who intend to vote for the bill at all or for any bankrupt bill, for having these registers, as well as the clerks and marshals and assignees, overhauled. We have provided that their fees shall be brought down, wherever it is just to do so, to the lowest limit. If any man is getting more than he ought, he is now to be restrained. He is restrained by one-half already. In the mean time, as the law now stands, reducing it one-half, it is only just to the great body of the registers of the country to say that the judges of the Supreme Court have told us, in the letter which has been read to you and printed, that they do not think we can wisely reduce these fees to any great extent. We can only provide, in special localities and places where there are extortion and exorbitance arising out of the great number of cases or the bad character of the men, for having them looked after and provided against; but you cannot, under a bankrupt law any more than under any other law, get honest work done without paying for it a fair and reasonable compensation.

Does my honorable friend suppose that a special commissioner, as he calls him I believe, is going to attend to the management of details in the administration of the bankrupt's estate without being paid for it? Does he find that the exceptional and special officers of the judicial courts of the United States get less pay for performing special services when called upon than they do as regular officers of the court? I think not; it is quite the reverse.

Therefore I say, not to enlarge upon this, because I have not the strength to do so, we have already provided in this very bill for disposing of one-half of the fees of the registers, leaving the same duties upon them. We have provided that the Supreme Court may consolidate their duties with those of other officers, when they shall come to consider, in the light of the proprieties of the thing itself and without any reference to what effect it may have upon the country one way or another, except the good effect of the administration of law, that they may rectify this by lumping these duties together or readjusting the subject as they like. Is that asking too much? Until this shall be done, and for the coming year, let me suggest to my friend this topic for consideration: These registers are now perfectly familiar with all the duties which belong to the administration of bankrupts' estates; they know the construction of the statutes; they know the course of business; and in a complicated system, as this bankrupt law is, and as all commercial codes are, an expert is of the greatest value to all parties, creditors, debtors, the public, everybody. It is of value to justice that these men, skilled in the performance of this duty, otherwise qualified, honest and upright according to the judgment of the courts who continue to hold them, should be retained in these positions. Even if we are to make a change, it is better to let the judges of the Supreme Court, who have supervised this matter all the time, do what we have provided for; and then if we find at the end of next year that there are still abuses that exist which could be corrected by dismissing the registers and leaving the courts to pick up their assistants from time to time, according as their favoritism or as the action of the parties might require, we can do it; but there is no necessity, with the provisions we have made now, to take this hurried step and dismiss all the registers in the country and turn over every bankrupt case to entirely fresh men who may not have had the least practice or experience on the subject.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I only desire to add one other reason against this amendment. It would increase the expense of the bankrupt practice very much. Every person who had occasion to have any business in bankruptcy transacted would have to employ counsel, whereas now persons can go before the registers and attend to a great many of the items of business themselves. Then there would be the inconvenience of going from one part of a State to another to the court instead of having a number of registers in the State. There is also the argument that these registers have been seven years in practice, and it is now proposed to turn over all these matters either to commissioners or to the courts. It seems to me very objectionable.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, we have now reached a very important part of this law, and I think we had better have a little more time to consider it. No harm can arise from letting it lie over for a few days; and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 6, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. DUNNELL. I notice that the Journal states that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LOWE] to the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," was disagreed to, and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CROUNSE] was agreed to. The fact is directly the reverse, and so appears in the report published in the RECORD. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas was agreed to, and that offered by the gentleman from Nebraska was disagreed to, as also the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected.

STEAMBOAT KITTY STRANG.

Mr. POTTER. As I expect to be absent from the House next week, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

There being no objection,

Mr. POTTER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1767) to change the name of the steamboat Kitty Strang; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Friday, committees will be called for reports of a private nature. The Committee on Military Affairs are still entitled to the floor.

EPHRAIM P. SHOWALTER.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of Ephraim P. Showalter; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL M'CLURE.

Mr. COBURN also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the claim of Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general, for credits on differences in his accounts as paymaster, under his official bond, dated March 2, 1859, be referred to the Court of Claims, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims; and if the court shall be satisfied from the evidence that any of the moneys charged to McClure were not in fact received by him, or that other just and equitable grounds exist for credits claimed by him, it shall make a decree setting forth the amount for which McClure shall be entitled to receive credit, upon which the proper accounting officers of the Treasury shall allow him the amount so decreed as a credit in the settlement of his accounts. The bill further provides that the testimony of McClure shall be received in his own behalf by the court; and until the determination of the cause the final adjustment of his accounts is suspended; and an appeal is to be allowed to either party, as in other cases.

Mr. COBURN. This is a case in which the assistant paymaster-general has a controversy with the Government in relation to the settlement of his accounts. It involves quite a large amount.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, does not this bill contain an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not carefully examined the bill; but he thinks not.

Mr. COBURN. I was about to state the effect of the bill; and I think it will be seen that it is not liable to a point of order. A large amount, perhaps $30,000 or $40,000, is in controversy between the assistant paymaster-general and the Government. This officer asks only that the matter may be referred to the Court of Claims. The only difference presented by this bill from an ordinary reference to that court is the provision that Colonel McClure shall have the right to testify in his own behalf before the Court of Claims—a privilege not ordinarily allowed. It strikes me that the bill is not properly to be classed with those making grants of money or property. It merely provides for a submission of this question to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. COBURN] whether it has appeared before the committee that this discrepancy in the accounts of Colonel McClure occurred during his first term as paymaster, early in the war?

Mr. COBURN. It occurred during the war, in 1862. It is on account of the lapse of time that this bill, to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction, now becomes necessary. Colonel McClure did not have notice of this matter till the time allowed by law for bringing the question before the court had expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the accounts of this officer for subsequent terms of office have all been satisfactorily adjusted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know that the point of order has been raised except conversationally; but lest this case should be taken as a precedent, he deems it proper to say that a bill referring a claim against the Government to the Court of Claims would legitimately go to the Committee of the Whole. But in this case the Chair does not understand the point to be pressed. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] insist on the point that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. RUSK. I do, if it contains an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It does not in itself contain an appropriation; but the Chair would regard it as a wrong precedent that a bill referring a claim against the Government to the Court of Claims should be passed by the House without receiving its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUSK. I ask that it shall go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not insist on the point of order. This is a matter which has the concurrence of the Paymaster-General of the Army, and it is important that the accounts should be adjusted as quickly as possible. It is a case about which there is no suspicion of wrong at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the fact to be that this gentleman is still in the service, and the subsequent accounts have all been satisfactorily settled, and that this discrepancy occurred early in the war, when mistakes were frequently made.

Mr. RUSK. What is the objection to this bill going to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. NIBLACK. The only objection is that it will cause unnecessary delay. The difficulty in this case arises out of a discrepancy which can only be settled by the testimony to be submitted; and the object of this bill, as I understand it, is to provide a tribunal before which the testimony can be submitted for a decision upon the question.

Mr. RUSK. I withdraw my objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF ARMY CLOTHING.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

LUCIUS A. ROUNTREE.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Rountree.

The bill was read.

Mr. RUSK. This bill contains an appropriation. I raise the point of order that it must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is good, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JAMES LONG.

Mr. NESMITH also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

GEORGE H. HERRING.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition of George H. Herring, late a private Company B, Fifty-ninth Illinois Volunteers, for relief from disabilities on a charge of desertion, and for an honorable discharge; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLESTON CITADEL.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the joint resolution of the Legislature of South Carolina, requesting the use of the citadel in Charleston for South Carolina militia; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM E. CHILDS.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1779) for the relief of William E. Childs; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

J. W. ULRICH.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition of J. W. Ulrich, late a private in Company A, Seventh Wisconsin Infantry, for removal of the charge of desertion, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAME.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1003) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to John Laube de Laubenfels.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas John Laube de Laubenfels, being of foreign birth, and holding a title of nobility, desiring to become a citizen of the United States, renounced his title of nobility; and whereas the said John Laube de Laubenfels, being informed that it was also necessary for him to renounce his name, assumed the name of John Rziha, under which name the said John Laube de Laubenfels entered the Army of the United States, and now holds in said Army the rank and commission of a captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry, under the name of John Rziha; and whereas the said John Laube de Laubenfels is desirous of resuming his own name: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be authorized and directed to change, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, the name of John Rziha, captain in the Fourth Regiment of Infantry of the Army of the United States, to John Laube de Laubenfels; and that upon such change being made, the said John Laube de Laubenfels shall hold the relative rank in said regiment and Army which he has heretofore held under the name of John Rziha, and shall be entitled to the same pay and emoluments, and to succeed to all the rights which he would have had under the name and designation of John Rziha: Provided, That the said change of name shall in no manner affect the liabilities and responsibilities, as an officer of the Army of the United States, of said John Laube de Laubenfels; but that under the name and designation of John Laube de Laubenfels, he shall be subject to all the liabilities, duties, and responsibilities that he would have been subject or liable to under the name and designation of John Rziha.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. POTTER. Is there a report?

Mr. HUNTON. There is.

Mr. POTTER. I should like to hear it read.

The report was read. The committee state in the report that it seems that when this officer joined the Army of the United States he was led to believe that, being a foreigner, it was necessary, not only to renounce allegiance to and titles of foreign governments, but to change the name he had borne in connection with them. He therefore took the name of his wife's family, John Rziha; but now, very naturally, desires to assume his proper name; and the Adjutant-General informs the committee that there is no objection to passing the bill authorizing him to assume his proper name. The committee, therefore, recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the committee would inform us whether this captain, under the name in which he served in the Army, did anything discreditable to that name.

Mr. HUNTON. Nothing of the kind that I know of.

Mr. POTTER. Is there any letter from the War Department in relation to this matter?

Mr. HUNTON. There is.

Mr. POTTER. Let it be read.

The letter of the Adjutant-General stating that there was no objection to the passage of the bill was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENOCH BURNETT.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back the petition of Enoch Burnett, of Ducktown, Tennessee, for arrears of pensions; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN A. B. DYER.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow to Captain A. B. Dyer, now brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, in settling his accounts, the sum of $9,853.42, and such outstanding checks as may hereafter be paid by the Treasury Department and charged to his account, the whole not to exceed the sum of $11,709.29, that being the amount deposited to his credit in the United States depository at Norfolk, Virginia, in April, 1861, as certified by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and transferred by the depositary to the rebel authorities at Richmond.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this bill should first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 345) to relieve certain officers therein named, late members of Company K, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of mutiny.

The bill, which was read, provides that Joseph Briggs, sergeant; Silas B. Harrington and Peter Redmond, corporals; and Peter Hanley, Alexander Valley, Michael Murphy, Owen Cahill, William McNech, George Wilson, Samuel O'Neal, Henry F. Errett, and John Dunne, privates, and all late members of Company K, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, shall be relieved from the proceedings, findings, and sentence of a court-martial approved by Brigadier-General K. Garrard, January 19, 1865, and wherein they were severally convicted of mutiny; and the said proceedings, findings, and sentence are hereby set aside and revoked, and the said persons restored in all respects to the same rights and privileges to which they would have been entitled if said proceedings, findings, and sentence had not been had or rendered.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. This bill has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs. It appears by a copy of the records in the War Department that these men were all tried for mutiny and found guilty, and they were sentenced to serve various periods, three months to one year, in a military prison to be designated by the general commanding the department, and to forfeit their pay and allowances. The only pretense for this charge against these men was the simple fact that on a certain occasion they refused to go upon duty when ordered.

It appears by the records of the War Department that at the time they refused to go upon duty the time of service of the whole company had expired. It also appears that one company of the regiment, and only one company, was mustered in one or two months after the other nine companies had been mustered in. It was claimed by the officers of the regiment that the company to which these soldiers belonged should remain in the service until the tenth company had served their full three years. These men believed, and honestly believed, as a great many officers believed, that after they had served their full three years they were entitled to be mustered out of the service, without any regard whatever to the question as to when the other company of the regiment might have been mustered into the service. That is the only point in this case.

Although these men were charged with mutiny, although they were found guilty of that crime, they never in fact resisted their officers; they never in fact resisted any military authority over them. But when they believed their time had expired they simply claimed the right to be mustered out, and on one occasion when ordered to go upon duty they refused to do so. It appears beyond all question that they were faithful soldiers, had served their full three years, had been engaged in ten or twelve of the principal battles of the late war. They are indorsed fully by their officers as good soldiers.

The Committee on Military Affairs unanimously recommend the passage of a bill for their relief. They believe that these men having all suffered an imprisonment of several months, have suffered punishment enough for so slight an offense as simply refusing upon one occasion to go upon duty, and that not in the presence of the enemy or when they were required to fight. That is all there is in this case.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN N. NEWMAN.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of John N. Newman, late an acting first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of War to place the name of John N. Newman on the rolls as first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, from August 15, 1863, to February 2, 1864, and that the proper accounting and pay officers of the Government shall allow and pay to said Newman the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant of cavalry during the said time, deducting any sum or sums he may have received on account of military service during the said period.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I raise the point of order upon that bill that it should first be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same was ordered to be printed.

JONATHAN L. MANN.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 1770) for the relief of Jonathan L. Mann, late a chaplain in the volunteer service of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

Brown, a soldier in the Mexican war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM N. WILLIAMS.

MATTHIAS WHITEHEAD.

No. 1774) for the relief of Matthias Whitehead; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

FOSTER A. HIXON.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 1775) for the relief of Foster A. Hixon, late paymaster in the Army; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow in the settlement of the accounts of Major Foster A. Hixon, late paymaster in the United States Army, a credit of $10,000 for the amount stolen from him at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 1st of March, 1867, no part of said allowance to be used to settle any other account of said paymaster, and the allowance to be in lieu of all existing allowances to him under existing laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. Should not that bill go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read at length.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Let the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as the point of order is insisted on.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN S. WELLER, SR.

Mr. ALBRIGHT also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition of Benjamin S. Weller, sr., of Davidson County, Tennessee; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

JOHN MALICOTE.

Mr. ALBRIGHT also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of John Malicote, of Company A, Twelfth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

GEORGE YOUNT.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of George Yount, late second lieutenant Company I, Third Missouri Cavalry-Infantry; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Paymaster-General of the Army to pay to George Yount, late second lieutenant of Company I, Third Missouri Cavalry-Infantry, out of any money appropriated, or which may be hereafter appropriated, for the pay of the Army, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of the Army from the 1st of September, 1863, to the 2d of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 725) for the relief of James C. Livingston, late a private in Company E, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that James C. Livingston, late a private in Company E, Third Iowa Regiment of Volunteer Infantry, shall be entitled to an honorable discharge from the service of the United States, to date July 22, 1865, the date of the final muster of his regiment, and shall be entitled to his back pay and bounty, and shall be restored to all homestead and other rights as fully and completely as though he had been honorably mustered out of said service with his regiment; provided that the claim for bounty and back pay of the said James C. Livingston shall be adjusted and paid without reference to the limitations contained in any law heretofore enacted for the filing of such claims in the Treasury Department.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 910) for the relief of H. A. Kelly, late a first lieutenant of the Eighth Tennessee Cavalry.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, required to pay to Henry A. Kelly, late first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, his pay as such lieutenant from the 2d day of February, 1864, to the 14th day of May, 1864.

The bill was laid on the table.

ALEXANDER BURTCH.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1313) for the relief of Alexander Burtch, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Adjutant-General of the Army is hereby authorized and directed to change the record of desertion against Alexander Burtch, late veteran soldier of Company H, First Indiana Heavy Artillery, formerly Twenty-first Indiana Infantry Volunteers, and substitute therefor, "Absent from September 25, 1865." And the said Alexander Burtch shall be allowed and paid the amount remaining due and accrued up to the time of his absence aforesaid, but shall not be entitled to any bounty subsequently granted by the United States.

Mr. DONNAN. As the bill provides for the surrender of bounty, the members of this House, perhaps, will consent to pass it without further words.

Mr. RUSK. I make the point of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

MATTHEW WOODRUFF.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1777) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late a first sergeant Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the proper officers of the War Department be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to change the record of desertion marked against Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the military service of the United States of the same date as the muster-out of that regiment, and that he shall be entitled to all his rights as to pay and bounty, drawing pay for the time of his absence from his command as though he had been honorably mustered out of the service with his regiment; that any claims for such pay and bounty shall be adjusted without reference to any limitations heretofore enacted for the filing of such claim in the Treasury Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and the bill will go to the committee.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

SIMEON J. THOMPSON.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 133) for the relief of Simeon J. Thompson, late an acting second lieutenant Company B, Seventy-ninth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DONNAN. The committee make no objection to that reference. When the bill shall be considered in Committee of the Whole they will state their reasons for reporting it adversely.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MAJOR FRANK Y. COMMAGERE.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back adversely the petition of Major Frank Y. Commagere, late major of cavalry; which was laid on the table.

RAILROAD IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1778) granting the right of way for a railroad from the wharf of the Baltimore Steam-Packet Company, at Old Point Comfort, Elizabeth City County, Virginia, to Mill Creek Bridge, in the same county; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that the right of way for a narrow-gauge railway, with the privilege of constructing, repairing, and using the railway, from the northern abutment of Mill Creek Bridge, in Elizabeth City County, Virginia, to the wharf at Old Point Comfort, Virginia, at which the boats of the Baltimore Steam-Packet Company now land, and to any other wharf or wharves at Old Point Comfort, at which vessels may hereafter receive and deposit freight, be granted to the Hampton and Fort Monroe Railroad Company of Virginia. But the company is not to occupy along the line of its track a space of greater width than six feet; the construction of the road is not to conflict with the interests of the Government; the privilege granted is to be subject to any tax assessed thereon by the Congress of the United States of America, or the State of Virginia, or to any future legislation of Congress, or to any order of the President of the United States revoking or curtailing the privilege herein granted, or limiting in any respect whatever the terms of this grant, or changing the route of the railroad. It is provided further that the road shall be constructed within two years from the passage of this act.

Mr. COBURN. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. If the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. COBURN] will permit me, I can explain the bill in a moment, so that I think there will be no objection to it on the part of any member.

Mr. COBURN. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to reserve the point of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being reserved, the gentleman from Virginia will, unless there is objection, make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. A company of gentlemen residing in the county of Elizabeth City, Virginia, have associated themselves together for the purpose of constructing a narrow-gauge railroad from the village of Hampton, in that county, to the wharf of the Baltimore Steam-Packet Company at Fortress Monroe. In constructing this road it is necessary to pass along a line of territory belonging to the United States Government. These gentlemen ask from Congress permission to lay their track along this public highway. The Secretary of War, not having himself power to grant this permission, has referred the matter to Congress. The Secretary of War and the Engineer Department, as well as the commanding military officers at Fortress Monroe, approve of this bill and desire its passage. They would themselves have given the necessary permission if they had the power to do so under the law.

The bill contains no appropriation of any kind; it makes no land grant. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is thoroughly conversant with every foot of the land in question, and with all the circumstances connected with the case. There can be no possible objection to the measure.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask a single question. Does this bill secure to the Government the right to take possession of or to remove this railroad, if that should be necessary, in case of war?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. It provides that the President of the United States may order the removal of the road at any time, and that it shall be subject to any future legislation by Congress.

Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts. My reason for asking this question is on account of some difficulty we had at Fortress Monroe during the late war. Congress had given to somebody a right to erect a hotel there; and that hotel was occupied. But when the Merrimac came down it was necessary to tear down that hotel. The owner then came in and claimed $20,000 damages against the United States on account of the tearing down of that hotel. Now, if it should become necessary, in case of war, for the Government to tear up this railroad, I do not want the company to bring in a bill for damages against the Government.

Mr. COBURN. The power of the President to take possession of the road is expressly reserved.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Without any claim for damages?

Mr. COBURN. That provision is not in the bill; it ought to be inserted. I am inclined to think the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POTTER. How wide is this public highway on which it is proposed to construct this railroad?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. About sixty feet; and it is proposed that the company shall occupy a space not greater than six feet for the purpose of laying a narrow-gauge railroad.

Mr. POTTER. For what distance is it proposed to carry this railroad along this public highway?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. A little more than a mile.

Mr. POTTER. Why cannot the company carry its road alongside this highway, instead of on it?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. It is impossible to extend the railroad to Fortress Monroe without going over this strip of land belonging to the United States. The military authorities approve the bill, and it is carefully guarded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that this bill can be best considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not see why it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole. It does not contain any appropriation of money or grant of public property.

Mr. RUSK. I raise the point whether this is not a public bill, and consequently out of order upon the call for private bills.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. This company is already organized; they are ready to go to work. The men whom it is designed to employ in this work are ready and anxious to go to work; they are now suffering from want of this labor. To pass this bill will save them possibly from destitution. I hope there will be no objection to passing this bill, so these men may go to work at once.

Mr. RUSK. I make the point of order that this is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin raises the point of order this is a public bill. That would have been a good point if it had been raised in time.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not understand why gentlemen should make objection to the passage of this bill. I do not see what reasonable objection can be made against it. Gentlemen certainly have not stated any. It will give work to three hundred men whose families depend upon their labor for support. If the bill be not passed now, it will only prevent these men from getting this work for a month or six weeks longer. I hope, therefore, Mr. Speaker, no captious objection will be made. There is no reason for any objection, and no gentleman can state any.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order against the bill that it must go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. There is no real necessity for this bill going to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Virginia thinks it should not go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar I will withdraw my objection. I understood from the chairman of the committee, as I thought, it should go there.

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from Wisconsin would have been a good point if made in season.

Mr. COBURN. I will suggest an amendment to the bill, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no claim for damages against the United States shall arise from said change or removal.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not see any objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suggest, instead of granting the right of way, we only grant permission to lay a narrow-gauge track across the lands of the United States.

Mr. COBURN. It is about the same thing, to give permission to lay a track and to grant the right of way across the lands of the United States.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to strike out the words "right of way," and insert in lieu thereof these words, "permission be granted to lay a track;" so it will read: "permission be granted to lay a track for a narrow-gauge railway," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed the bill was simply a grant of the right of way over the public lands.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. That is all it is. The track will pass over property of the United States. There is a bridge which connects this peninsula upon which works of the United States, Fortress Monroe, and ordnance shops are situated. They are connected with the rest of the country by the bridge across the river between Hampton and Fortress Monroe. It is a public highway, but when it crosses that bridge and gets upon this peninsula, it runs from that point to the wharves of the Baltimore Steam-Packet Company, across land which belongs to the United States, jurisdiction over which has been ceded to the United States by the State of Virginia. These gentlemen simply ask the privilege of laying their track across these lands.

Mr. POTTER. I move to insert "the same being the property of the United States."

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. That of course refers to the land and not to the railroad.

Mr. POTTER. Certainly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1462) to repeal the fourteenth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1871," approved July 15, 1870; and the same was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries; who further announced that the President had approved and signed an act (H. R. No. 798) establishing certain post-routes.

STRAWBERRY PLAINS HIGH SCHOOL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] yesterday reported back from the Committee on Education and Labor a bill (H. R. No. 1444) for the relief of Strawberry Plains High School, East Tennessee, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on War Claims. It was inadvertently laid upon the table. He now asks the bill be taken from the table and referred as originally intended.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the table and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole, by order of the House, will now take up and proceed to consider the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill upon the Private Calendar.

JOHN A. FISHER.

The first bill upon the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John A. Fisher, late first lieutenant in Company D, Twenty-third Regiment Missouri Volunteers, and pay him such pension as that allowed to the class of pensioners with which his present disability would class him, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report accompanying this bill be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John A. Fisher, having considered the same, submit the following report:

John A. Fisher, the petitioner, entered the service as first lieutenant of Company D, Twenty-third Regiment Missouri Volunteers, in July, 1861, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Pittsburgh Landing the 12th of October, 1862. He was subsequently exchanged and rejoined his regiment, from which he was discharged the 12th day of January, 1863, on account of disability contracted in the service. He did service, after discharge, as inspector of arms pro tempore, as lieutenant of an independent volunteer company against Morgan's raid, under the provost-marshal of Kentucky, in collecting Government property and capturing deserters, and in this service he was again taken prisoner and escaped; and last, in 1865, as a member of the United States special police force. The evidence also shows that while he was making a seizure under orders of the lieutenant of the force he was shot through the right eye, which made him almost blind; the other being defective before. His pension as a discharged soldier of the Twenty-third Regiment Missouri Volunteers being inadequate for his support in his present condition, he prays for an increase; and your committee, finding this a most extraordinary case, he being a soldier of the Mexican war, and his long term of service in the late war, and the fact that he was seizing Government property when wounded, are of the opinion that he is entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. RUSK. I move that this bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN BAKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1403) granting a pension to John Baker.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Baker, late a private in Company H, First Regiment of Cavalry in the regular Army, and pay him a pension at the rate of eight dollars a month.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the reports in all these cases should be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John Baker for a pension, submit the following report:

That the petitioner enlisted as a private in Company H, First Regiment of Cavalry, regular Army, for five years, having served out a prior enlistment in the service of the United States; that he was discharged from the service on a surgeon's certificate of disability at Camp Harney, State of Oregon, on the 9th day of May, 1871; that on the 23d day of April, 1871, he was relieved from guard duty, and obtained permission from the officer commanding said company to go outside the lines to a place known as Rattlesnake Creek, and within call of the garrison, for the purpose of hunting duck; that he took with him a shot-gun, and, while in the act of firing at game, the gun prematurely exploded, and so shattered his left arm as to necessitate its amputation below the elbow, which is the disability for which he was discharged; that it was a common practice in camp there for soldiers, by permission of their commanding officers, to go out hunting, the game killed being thrown into the common mess; that the petitioner has applied for a pension, and that his application has been rejected, upon the ground that he was not acting within the line of his duty when the accident happened; that the petitioner is now at the Soldiers' Home, in the District of Columbia, wholly destitute, and incapable of earning a support.

It appears by the certificates of the captain and the first and second lieutenants of the company in which he was serving at the time of the accident that he is an intelligent, honest, and temperate man, and a faithful and excellent soldier.

Wherefore the committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. STORM. This is the most extraordinary bill, I believe, that I have had the pleasure of hearing reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions since I have been a member of Congress. If the House should pass a bill of this character it will open the doors to thousands of just such claims, which have been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that injuries of this kind were not received while in the line of duty. There are thousands of cases just as meritorious as this is that will come here if we once establish the precedent. I hope the Committee of the Whole will not indorse the action of the Committee on Pensions who have reported this bill. I am certain that the committee could not have seriously reflected upon what they were doing when they reported this bill with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] suggests that this bill could not have been well considered by the committee that reports it. Allow me to say that it was before that committee for a long time, and that we took great pains to investigate the case. It is true that this case does not come within the precise letter of the law; if it did it would not have been before our committee. I suppose the very purpose for which the Committee on Invalid Pensions is constituted is to consider just such cases as these.

According to the evidence before the committee it is a common practice for soldiers to have leave of the commanding officer of the post, when they are not required to be on duty, to go outside of the lines, but within call of the garrison, for the purpose of hunting, as this man did. As the gentleman says, if you reject this bill you will reject a thousand other cases that do not come exactly within the letter of the law. The evidence is clear and distinct that this man was one of the very best soldiers in the service. The fact that he went outside of the lines for the purpose of hunting does not change the merits of the case at all, in the view of your committee. The committee were unanimous in the opinion that a pension should be granted in this case; that if we limit ourselves to the limit of the law you might as well discharge your committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the Committee on Invalid Pensions consider that this case comes within the spirit of the law?

Mr. SMALL. We certainly do.

Mr. HOLMAN. The soldier was not, in any proper sense, in the line of his duty.

Mr. SMALL. The report states fully what were the facts. The gentleman asks if this comes within the spirit of the law. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that it did.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Does the gentleman say that if this bill passes a thousand similar bills will pass?

Mr. SMALL. No, Mr. Chairman; I say that if this bill is rejected because the case does not come within the letter of the law, then you must reject all similar cases that come before the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I understood the gentleman to say that the rejection of this bill would reject a thousand cases of a similar nature.

Mr. SMALL. No, sir. I said that there are a thousand similar cases that do not come within the letter of the law.

The question being taken on laying the bill aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass, there were—ayes 39, noes 27; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STORM and Mr. SMALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes not counted.

So the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

THOMAS R. HARDWICK.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 510) granting a pension to Thomas R. Hardwick.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas R. Hardwick, late a sergeant in Company E, Eighth Regiment Heavy Artillery New York Volunteers, from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill No. 510, entitled "A bill granting a pension to Thomas R. Hardwick," submitted the following report:

The proof shows that said Hardwick enlisted as first sergeant in Company D, Fourteenth New York Volunteers, on the 16th day of April, 1861, for two years, and was mustered in May 6, 1861; that on the 16th day of January, 1864, he re-enlisted as sergeant in Company E, Eighth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, for three years or during the war, and was honorably discharged May 30, 1865; that on the 29th day of December, 1864, he was appointed color-sergeant; that he was a faithful soldier, and did his duty to the satisfaction of his officers; and Dr. Anson Owen, his physician, testifies that he has known Hardwick for the last sixteen years; that he was a sound, healthy man before he went into the service of the United States, and that during said service he became an invalid; and that since the close of the war he has been affected with disease to such an extent as to render him unable to labor. And Dr. J. A. Barringer testifies that he knows said Hardwick personally, having treated him the past six months for chronic inflammation of the urinary passages and an enlargement of the prostate glands; that he is permanently disabled thereby and incapacitated to such an extent as to entirely unfit him for his usual business. Wherefore the committee report back said bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

WILLIAM F. KERR.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1404) for the relief of William F. Kerr.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William F. Kerr, of Indiana, a private soldier in Company D, Third Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, $131.50, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full for one horse and equipments owned by him, and abandoned by him by order of the officer in command at Dinwiddie Court-House, Virginia, on the 25th day of June, 1864, on a forced march, by which the said horse and equipments were totally lost to the soldier.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William F. Kerr, for relief, would respectfully report:

That it appears from the evidence in the case that on the 25th day of June, 1864, Mr. Kerr then being a private soldier in Company D, Third Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, and mounted on his own horse, the said horse and equipments were abandoned by said soldier at Dinwiddie Court-House, Virginia, by order of the commanding officer, the reason of the abandonment being that the United States troops, of which said Company D was a part, was on a forced march, the said horse became exhausted and gave out on account of insufficient forage and fatigue, and had to be abandoned, and was entirely lost to the said soldier.

The Third Auditor, in a letter dated January 30, 1871, says: "There is no doubt as to the equity of his claim, but as the act under which this class of claims are adjusted specifies the kind of loss for which payment is provided, and as this is not one of the losses specified, there was no alternative; it had to be disallowed." This claim was before the Third Auditor for allowance.

Your committee is of the opinion that the horse of a soldier lost under the circumstances above set forth should be paid for by the Government as coming within the spirit of the law giving compensation when the loss was sustained in battle, and therefore think the soldier is entitled to the relief he asks. The horse and equipments are shown to have been worth $131.50, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill for the payment of that sum to the soldier.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that this bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection to the adoption of that motion; but I wish to call the attention of the House, and particularly of the Committee on War Claims, to the principle involved in this case. The law as it now stands is, as stated by the Third Auditor, that property of this kind can only be paid for where it has been actually lost in battle. Hence, all claims of this kind for property not actually lost in battle have been rejected by the Third Auditor. The Third Auditor has once or twice recommended to Congress the passage of a general act to enlarge the scope of the present law so as to embrace this class of cases. In my judgment the Committee on War Claims should report such a measure at the present session. I have myself called their attention to the matter. I have no objection to this bill, because it appears to be manifestly just.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Vermont would find it very difficult to frame a general act which would cover all claims of this class. The number of these claims rejected by the Third Auditor under the strict interpretation of the law is not very large; and I think it would be quite difficult to frame a general provision which would cover them.

Under the act of 1849, as amended in 1864, the rule is that where a horse has been killed in battle, or lost in transportation, or lost by the failure of the Government to furnish forage, the soldier is entitled to be reimbursed for the loss. The committee think that in this case the loss was really occasioned by reason of insufficient forage; such seems to be the weight of the testimony, although the claim was rejected by the Third Auditor upon the ground that the horse was not actually lost in battle. If there were many of these claims, I would myself favor the adoption of a general law on the subject; but, under the circumstances, I do not think it should be attempted.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

VICTOR MYLIUS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1405) for the relief of Victor Mylius, of Macoupin County, Illinois.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Victor Mylius, late sergeant in the Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 17th day of April to the 16th day of May, 1863, and the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of infantry thereafter to the 6th day of June, 1865, less the amount received by him as a sergeant in said regiment for the period above named.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 348) for the relief of Victor Mylius, late first sergeant in Company —, Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, report:

That a bill similar to the above-named was considered by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress, agreed to, and the same passed the House, failing, however, to secure action in the Senate in that Congress; that a report prepared and made by the said committee covers all the facts in the case, and fully meets the approval of the Committee on War Claims, which adopt the same, and it is hereto appended:

"That memorialist was a foot-soldier in the Sixty-eighth New York, Colonel Salm-Salm's regiment, from its organization, and was wounded and captured as sergeant commanding his company at the battle of Gettysburgh, on the 1st of July, 1863. Thenceforward he was held and imprisoned by the enemy nine months at Richmond, and one month at Danville, Virginia; three months at Macon, and two months at Savannah, Georgia; two months at Columbia, South Carolina, and one month at Charlotte, North Carolina; one year and eight months in all, when he was exchanged, and rejoined his regiment, from Annapolis, Maryland, on the 16th of May, 1865, and was honorably mustered out of service on the 6th of June, 1865.

"That on the 10th of November, 1863, the said Victor Mylius was appointed and commissioned by the governor of the State of New York as second lieutenant in said regiment, with rank from the 17th of April, 1863, and also as first lieutenant, with rank from the 16th of May, 1863, upon which commissions the said Victor Mylius was never mustered, by reason of his capture and imprisonment, and consequent absence from his regiment. At the period of his release, and upon rejoining the regiment, the vacancies for which he was commissioned were filled by other appointments, in consequence of which he was mustered out as a sergeant.

"The committee have reason to believe that the memorialist was a most efficient soldier, that his promotion was for meritorious conduct evinced on the battle-fields of Chancellorsville and Gettysburgh, and that the accident of his capture, in this instance, ought not to deprive him of the rank and pay which were intended to be conferred by the governor of his State.

"The committee therefore recommend that the Secretary of War and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department recognize and pay the service of Victor Mylius as second lieutenant from the 17th of April to the 16th of May, 1863, and as first lieutenant thereafter to the 6th of June, 1865, when he was mustered out of the service, deducting the pay received by him during the same time in any other military capacity."

Concurring fully with the foregoing, your committee report the accompanying as a substitute for House Bill No. 348, with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to ask the gentleman having charge of this bill what occasion there is for its passage—whether we have not a general law covering precisely this class of cases?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a general law on the subject. The gentleman from Vermont should remember, however, that it is found practically impossible to have that law carried into effect; and since its passage the practice has been to report individual bills of this kind. I agree with the gentleman that there is a law covering the case, but it is practically inoperative.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. In further answer to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] I will take the liberty of saying that bills of this sort were passed by this House at the last session, for the reason assigned by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that the law is inoperative and is not executed by the proper officers. Hence it has been deemed necessary to pass special bills.

Mr. POLAND. From the statement of this case in the report it would seem to be meritorious and just; but it is one that is precisely within the general law applicable to cases of this class. It strikes me it is entirely improper to be passing separate individual bills for cases already provided for by the general law; and although it may be true somebody in the War Department gives construction to that law which makes it entirely inoperative, it seems to me the proper course would be for Congress, in some way or other, to contrive something that will make that law effective and compel the Department to carry out the law; that they shall not be allowed to ignore the general law which Congress has passed on this subject and intended to apply to all this class of cases. But so long as we allow that construction to prevail and the will of Congress to be overborne by that Department, we are, in my judgment, stultifying ourselves.

Mr. HOLMAN. I agree in what has been said by the gentleman from Vermont; but, as he well knows, from the time of the passage of the general law up to this moment, although the law has remained upon the statute-book, the only mode for redress in these cases has been what is proposed in the bill now pending. I believe the gentleman from Vermont himself framed the bill which became the general law, and in reference to which the War Department gives a construction rendering it practically inoperative, and he will confer a great service on the country and save a good deal of the time spent upon this special legislation if he will frame some measure to compel the War Department to carry out the purpose which Congress had in view when it passed the general law.

Mr. POLAND. My friend from Indiana is mistaken in supposing I was the author of that bill, or that I knew anything about it at the time of its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought the gentleman reported the bill to the House.

Mr. POLAND. The bill is now a statute upon the statute-book. It was reported to this House from the Military Committee, and passed both Houses of Congress, and was approved by the President. I am aware the War Department gave a construction to it which renders it inoperative—making it nullify itself. The chairman of the Military Committee in the last Congress, whom I see before me, reported a bill for the purpose of correcting this misconstruction—for it is nothing but a misconstruction of the law by the War Department—and instead of Congress allowing such a construction as this and taking it upon ourselves to pass individual bills, it is the duty of Congress to make the general law effective and compel the War Department to enforce it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reason why I stated it as my recollection the gentleman from Vermont had prepared the bill was this: I know he had called the attention of the House to the necessity of that act—that is, for the necessity of a general law which should govern in all this class of cases; that these private cases should not be considered separately and separate bills passed for them, but that Congress should require the War Department to carry the spirit of that law into effect. From that circumstance I got the impression he had reported the bill.

Mr. POLAND. In the last Congress the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill for the purpose of correcting this misconstruction of the law by the War Department; and very likely that committee will bring it before the House again. I am unwilling, for one, Mr. Chairman, when we have passed a general law providing for this class of cases, clearly making it the duty of the War Department, to allow that Congress shall permit any one of the Departments of the Government to render that law inoperative, compelling us to spend our time in providing for these individual cases. That is the ground of my opposition.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. One word, Mr. Chairman, before we pass from this subject. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SCUDDER] is absent, and while the gentleman from Vermont admits there is merit in this bill, I hope the House will not make an exception in this case when the gentleman from New York is not here to defend his position. I hope it will take the course heretofore given to all similar cases.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM STODDARD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 154) for the relief of William Stoddard, late assistant quartermaster of the United States Volunteers.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William Stoddard, late assistant quartermaster United States Volunteers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $360; that sum being the amount of private funds belonging to the said Stoddard which was seized by military authority and afterward covered into the Treasury.

Mr. KELLOGG. The report is a long one; and with the consent of the committee I will make a brief statement and have a letter read from the Secretary of War. Mr. Stoddard, during the years 1862 and 1863, was an assistant quartermaster of the United States Volunteers, on duty at Alexandria, Virginia. Suspicion was aroused in December, 1863, and, on order of the Secretary of War, the papers, accounts, and moneys in his hands were seized. He had an account of some $12,000,000, and though he tried to get an early settlement that settlement was not completed until August, 1869. Among his effects, in a package marked "private," were $360 of his own private funds. When he applied for the return of that money he was informed that in December, 1868, under a law, this money had been covered into the Treasury, and for that reason, and for that only, it could not be paid to him.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 28, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to return the letter originally addressed to you by this Department on the 5th of January, 1870, relative to a sum of $360, the private funds of Captain William Stoddard, assistant quartermaster, and alleged to have been taken from his possession when the public funds in his charge were seized by this Department during the late war; and, in reply to your application for a certificate that the amount named was the private property of Captain Stoddard, to state that, upon investigation into the subject, there appears such reasonable evidence in support of the allegation that the amount named was private property as would induce this Department, were the money still in its possession, to restore, without hesitation, the sum of $360 to the claimant.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

JOHN BULL, Esq.,
Attorney at Law, Washington.

Mr. KELLOGG. This provides for the payment of the sum taken, without interest.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM SWANZEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 141) granting a pension to William Swanzey.

Mr. BURCHARD. I request that that bill be passed over. It will be observed, by examining the report made by the committee, that this is a meritorious case; the matter is pending before the Commissioner, and, from what is stated by the committee, I am satisfied that it is a case which does not require a special bill for relief from Congress, for the report of the committee shows that the Commissioner would be amply justified in granting a pension on the proofs before him.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be laid aside informally.

There was no objection.

MONUMENT TO CHEVALIER DE TERNAY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 194) in relation to the monument erected to the memory of the Chevalier de Ternay.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $800, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense of repairing and protecting from decay the monument erected at Newport, Rhode Island, to the memory of the Chevalier de Ternay, the commander of the French naval forces in aid of the American Revolution, in the year 1780; the money hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. EAMES. This bill makes an appropriation for the preservation of a monument erected at Newport, Rhode Island, to the memory of Chevalier de Ternay.

In the summer of 1780 six ships of the line, two frigates, and several other armed vessels of the French navy, under the command of Chevalier de Ternay, with transports containing six or seven thousand French troops, under the command of Count Rochambeau, entered the harbor of Newport, in aid of the Colonies in their struggle for independence. There perhaps was never a darker period in that struggle than that of the winter at Valley Forge. The courage even of Washington began to falter. In a letter addressed to Congress about that time he expressed the opinion that unless some favorable change should speedily take place the American Army would be compelled to disband and give up the unequal contest. But the clouds broke, and hope and courage in the Army and throughout the Colonies revived when, in 1778, France, by treaties of alliance and of amity and commerce, guaranteed to the United States their liberty, sovereignty, and independence. These treaties have justly been considered as the turning point in the struggle of the Colonies for national life.

It was under these treaties that Chevalier de Ternay and Count Rochambeau, in command of the naval and military forces to which I have referred, entered the harbor of Newport, and from that time co-operated with the American Army till the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, in the fall of 1781, to the allied forces of Rochambeau and Washington; thus virtually terminating the contest, and securing the recognition of the nationality of the United States. De Ternay continued in the command of this naval force until his death, which occurred suddenly at Newport, Rhode Island, in the winter of 1780. He was buried in the grounds of a Protestant Episcopal church of that city, a portion of which was set apart and consecrated according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church for his burial; and after the peace of Paris a monument was erected by the King of France to his memory, on which was inscribed a record of his rank, services, and virtues.

On a recent visit to Newport the French minister at Washington found this monument crumbling and the inscription partially effaced. He caused the one to be repaired and the other to be restored. It was an act worthy of a Frenchman, in memory of a distinguished French admiral. But it was an act that, in my judgment, ought to have been performed by the Government, in whose struggle for liberty De Ternay had rendered his last naval service, and on whose soil his mortal remains found their last resting place. France, sir, in aid of the Colonies in their struggle for independence, expended upward of fourteen hundred thousand francs, and laid upon the altar of liberty the sacrifice, not only of this treasure, but also the lives of many of her brave soldiers and sailors, and stood nobly and faithfully by her guarantee until the close of the contest. And it seems to me that this recognition is demanded on the part of the Government of the United States in grateful remembrance of the aid of France, and as a means of keeping fresh in the memory of the American people her invaluable services, as well as of assuring the French people that, although the lapse of nearly a century may obliterate the inscription on the monument, erected by the French King in memory of this distinguished naval officer, yet it can never obliterate or efface from the hearts of the American people a grateful recollection of the generous support and sympathy of France in our struggle for national life.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, passed the Senate by a unanimous vote, and comes before this committee in consequence of a point of order having been raised. And after this brief explanation of the purpose for which the appropriation is to be made, I hope that it may be reported favorably to the House for concurrence with the Senate. I may also state that the bill has, informally, the approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. MYERS. I desire, on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to state that this bill was before the committee, and has its unanimous approval.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JACOB PARMENTER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob Parmenter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jacob Parmenter, of Plattsburgh, New York, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,237.19, in full for costs and expenses incurred by him as collector of customs for the district of Champlain, New York, in a suit brought against him for an official act.

Mr. WHEELER. This bill comes from the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that the accompanying report, with the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that no such papers accompany the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. They ought to be with the bill. I can explain the case in a few words. It is a bill to indemnify the claimant for costs and expenses incurred in defending a prosecution against him for an official act. The Secretary of the Treasury states in his letter that the costs were incurred in consequence of the negligence of the attorney for the people. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHARD H. DUTTON.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1574) for the relief of Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont.

The bill directs the Auditor for the Post-Office Department to credit Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, in the State of Vermont, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $128.68, being the amount of postage-stamps stolen from the safe of said post-office by burglars on the night of the 21st day of October, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

The report accompanying the bill was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 21) for the relief of Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont, present the following report:

It appears from the evidence in this case that the claimant, Richard H. Dutton, was postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont, and that while he was such postmaster, and on the night of the 21st of October, 1873, the said post-office was entered by burglars, the large iron safe therein, containing the postage-stamps belonging to the post-office, was blown open with powder, and postage-stamps belonging to the said office, amounting to the value of $128, were stolen therefrom without any fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

The facts above presented are fully sustained by affidavits on the part of said postmaster and several leading citizens of said town, and by a letter from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for said bill, directing the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit said postmaster with said sum of $128 on his account with said Department.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHARD H. SWIFT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1575) for the relief of Richard H. Swift.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Richard H. Swift, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,080.24, in full payment and satisfaction of all claim to moiety as informer in case of the United States against Jonathan M. Dair and certain property of the said Dair, and wherein judgment of condemnation was rendered in favor of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That bill comes from the Committee on Claims, and is accompanied by a report, which may be read.

The Clerk began the reading of the report, but before concluding,

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, said: This report is a very long one, and will take some time for its reading. I can state that the case was carefully examined by the Committee on Claims, and the bill is unanimously reported from that committee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to ask if the decision of the court that this claimant was not entitled to this moiety by reason of his being an assessor was in accordance with the law?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That is the question involved.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. And it is the question which I ask the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. This report further on shows that it is the uniform practice of the Treasury Department to allow and pay these moieties to such officers. The question was referred by the Treasury Department to the office of the Attorney-General when Hon. E. R. HOAR was in that office. He prepared and presented to the Secretary of the Treasury an elaborate opinion upon that point. One question presented to him was, whether assessors and their deputies were entitled, as informers, to moieties. He answered without hesitation that they had that right equally with other persons. He refers also to what is stated in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, that it is the uniform practice of the Treasury Department, where these cases are compromised, as the Treasury Department has the power to compromise them, to allow and pay these moieties to these officers. It appears from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury that it has been the uniform decision of the courts of the United States, with, perhaps, two exceptions, that such was the law. In this case it happened that the court held against the practice of the Treasury Department and the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Did the assessor take an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. He did, but the Secretary held that he had no power to act in the case. Had it been compromised in any way before final judgment, then it would have been within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to have paid this moiety, and he states that he would have done it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand from the reading of the report, so far as it has gone, that the amount here claimed was retained and placed in the care of the clerk of the court.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It was retained, and the court held that the party claiming was the first informer, and would have been entitled to the moiety but for the fact that he was an assessor.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I did not understand that the report went that length.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The conclusions of law which I have stated are all embodied in the latter part of the report. If any gentleman desires that it be read I will not object.

Mr. POTTER. I think the report had better be read.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I know all the facts in this case; it is right.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If any gentleman desires it, I hope the report will be read.

Mr. POTTER. I would rather hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] than to hear the report, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I do not desire to have it read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that all there is in the case now presented here is, that had it been compromised instead of going through the courts, this assessor would have been entitled to his moiety; but inasmuch as it was settled in the court, the court disallowed his claim. It is put upon the ground that he was the original informer, and is undoubtedly entitled to the moiety. I can see no objection to the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask the whole report be printed in the RECORD as if it had been read.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done if there be no objection.

No objection was made.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 129) for the relief of Richard H. Swift, present the following report:

That from a careful consideration of this case, it appears that from the month of October, 1865, until the month of August, 1870, the claimant, Richard H. Swift, was assessor of internal revenue for the fourth district of the State of Indiana. He claims in his petition that while exercising the duties of said office, and in the month of December, 1867, he was the first informant and gave the first information whereby certain proceedings were instituted and commenced for the seizure of the distillery, and a large lot of distilled spirits, owned by one Jonathan M. Dair, of said district, and there situate; and that such proceedings were had in the district court of the United States for said State, in pursuance of such seizure, that judgment was rendered in said cause in favor of the United States, and against said property seized, and against said Dair; that said property was seized and said judgment rendered, because the said Dair had been fraudulently manufacturing and removing from said distillery distilled spirits without paying the tax due thereon to the United States; and that the amount collected on said judgment of forfeiture, and paid into the Treasury of the United States, amounted to the sum of $38,854.64, upon which said Swift claimed, and now claims, that he was and is entitled to a moiety under the law, amounting to the sum of $4,080.64 as the first and only informer, and that the court only failed to allow and award him that sum as such moiety solely for the reason that he was, at the time of giving such information, and at the time of such seizure, assessor of internal revenue for said district, and, as such, was not entitled to such share.

It appears from the official certificate of the clerk of said court that the sum of $32,960.33 was paid into the Treasury of the United States under the decree of forfeiture rendered by said court on the 23d day of July, 1868, and that the sum of $4,080.24 was, by the order of said court, retained in the hands of said clerk to abide the claims of sundry informers; that the claims pending for the moiety were three being the claims of said Swift, Philip Lautenschlager, and A. L. Russell.

It also appears, from the official certificate of said clerk, that on the final hearing the court decided against all three of said claimants, and directed and ordered said sum of $4,080.24 to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, which said last-mentioned sum was paid into the Treasury of the United States in March, 1869, making a total paid into the Treasury of the United States, in pursuance of said seizure and judgment, of $37,040.57.

It appears from affidavits filed in this case that the judge who tried said cause and rendered said judgment, and the then United States district attorney for said district, are now both deceased.

It appears from the sworn statement of Jonathan W. Gordon that he was the attorney for said Swift in said cause in presenting to said court the claim of said Swift for said moiety, and that he was present when said judge rendered his decision thereon, and knows that said judge found and held that said Swift was the first and sole informer in said cause, and not the said two other claimants, or either of them; and that said judge announced his opinion and decision adverse to the claim of said Swift for said sum of $4,080.74 solely and only for the reason that, at the time such information was given and proceedings had, said Swift was an officer under the Government of the United States, and as such was not entitled to any share as informer.

Robert C. Bell states, under oath, that at the time said proceedings were had he was deputy United States attorney for said district, and fully corroborates the statement of said Gordon. He states that said Swift was very active in aiding the prosecution of said cause; that said judge held that neither of the other parties claiming was the first informer in said case; "and that the court also decided against said Swift; and that he was not entitled to said moiety on the sole ground that he was such assessor, and therefore an officer, and not entitled to receive said moiety, although the first informer in the case."

Said Bell further states "that this affiant knows of his own knowledge that said Swift was very vigilant, active, and efficient in investigating and unearthing the frauds perpetrated at the distillery of said Dair, and in procuring and furnishing to the district attorney's office the necessary proofs and evidence to insure and effect a forfeiture of said property, and at all times kept affiant, who had charge of the suit for forfeiture, fully advised of the progress made in such investigations so made, by letter and otherwise."

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of April 15, 1871, states it as his opinion that said Commissioner could not advise the payment out of the Treasury of said sum claimed by said Swift, for the reason that said matter having been passed upon by a court, and the decision of the court having been adverse to the claim of said Swift, there was no authority for such payment.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter dated December 31, 1872, and addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, in reference to said claim of said Swift, says:

"The letter, of which a copy is inclosed, addressed to me by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on April 15, 1871, states the knowledge of the Department on the subject. It will be seen that the United States court, which has exclusive jurisdiction of the question of informers, (see 14 Statutes at Large, page 145,) rejected Mr. Swift's claim as well as that of other applicants. He claims that this decision against him was solely on the ground that he was an internal-revenue officer. The transcript from the record of the court does not show this, but I find in the papers accompanying the letter of the committee certain evidence going to show that such was the case. On the question whether this evidence is or is not satisfactory I do not propose to express an opinion. If, however, the committee are satisfied that Mr. Swift's claim was disallowed simply because he was an internal-revenue officer, it may be proper to observe that I am informed, and believe, that in nearly all the judicial districts of the United States internal-revenue officers have been awarded informers' shares without objection, and that this Department has taken the same course, following an elaborate opinion of the Attorney-General."

Your committee would also state that the facts set forth in the claimant's petition are sworn to by the petitioner. The facts are not controverted by any one so far as your committee are advised, and the only question involved is simply whether or not the claimant because he was an assessor of internal revenue was by that fact debarred from becoming an informer under the law.

The act of 1866, to which the Secretary of the Treasury refers in his letter above cited, contains the following provision: "And where not otherwise provided for, such share as the Secretary of the Treasury shall, by general regulations, provide, not exceeding one moiety, nor more than $5,000 in any one case, shall be to the use of the person, to be ascertained by the court which shall have imposed or decreed any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, who shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing whereby such fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred; and when any sum is paid without suit, or before judgment, in lieu of fine, penalty, or forfeiture, and a share of the same is claimed by any person as informer, the Secretary of the Treasury, under general regulations to be by him prescribed, shall determine whether any claimant is entitled to such share as above limited, and to whom the same shall be paid, and shall make payment accordingly."

The same law also contains the following provision: "The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to compromise, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, any case arising under the internal-revenue laws, whether pending in court or otherwise."

From the law above quoted, and from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury above referred to, it is clear that if the suit against Dair had been compromised before final judgment, the Secretary of the Treasury would have had power, and would have exercised it, to pay to said Swift the moiety due him as informer. He did not pay it because, in his opinion, the court having rendered final judgment in the case, he had no power over the question.

The opinion of the Attorney-General, referred to in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, is very able and elaborate, and was rendered May 13, 1870, and covers the whole question.

The Secretary of the Treasury propounded to him certain questions for his reply and decision. The third was as follows: "Are collectors and assessors of internal revenue, their deputies, and assistants, or either of them, debarred from sharing as informers; and, if so, under what circumstances?"

In reply, the Attorney-General reviews all the legislation upon the subject, as well as the decisions of the courts, and comes to the conclusion, without question, that such officers, as well as other persons, may be informers under the law, and that such right has been uniformly recognized by all the courts, with perhaps two or three exceptions.

Upon a careful examination of the law and the decisions of the courts, together with the uniform practice of the Treasury Department, and upon full and careful examination of the opinion of the Attorney-General, your committee are of opinion that the law is clearly with the claimant; and that the court, having held that he was the first informer, and having fixed and set apart the amount due the informer, should have awarded and paid the same to the claimant. The amount having been paid into the Treasury of the United States, there is now no way in which the claimant can be paid but by the passage of an act for his relief.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for said bill, allowing and paying to said claimant the sum of $4,080.24.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

REUEL B. FULLER.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1576) for the relief of Reves B. Fuller, of Wilton, Maine.

The bill directs the Postmaster-General, in the settlement of the accounts of Reves B. Fuller, postmaster at Wilton, Franklin County, in the State of Maine, to credit the said Reves B. Fuller with the sum of $169, that being the amount of postage-stamps and postal funds stolen from the post-office of Wilton, without fault or negligence on the part of said Reves B. Fuller.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The first name of the person for whose relief this bill is reported should be "Reuel," instead of, as printed, "Reves."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will make the correction.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

SUSAN L. GALLOWAY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan L. Galloway.

The bill was read. It directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to cause to be paid to Susan L. Galloway, widow of Captain James L. Galloway, late of Company E, First Florida Cavalry, out of any money now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for the support of the Army, the full pay and emoluments of a captain of cavalry from April 26, 1864, to August 31, 1865.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 386) for the relief of Susan L. Galloway, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully make the following report:

It appears from the papers on file in the case that Susan L. Galloway is the widow of James L. Galloway, who was commissioned as captain of Company E, First Regiment Florida Cavalry, by Major-General Banks, on the 29th day of March, A. D. 1864.

Previous to the date of said commission, and some time in November, 1863, James L. Galloway had been authorized by Brigadier-General Asboth to recruit for the First Regiment of Florida Cavalry, with the assurance that he should be commissioned and mustered as captain therein.

While engaged in recruiting for this regiment, on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1864, Captain Galloway was captured, with several recruits, and held a prisoner of war until the 25th day of February, A. D. 1865.

At this time he was released on parol and reported to his regiment. Being a paroled prisoner of war, he was not assigned to duty or mustered until after his exchange, and not till the 1st day of September, A. D. 1865. He received no compensation prior to the date of his said muster.

It further appears from the papers on file that Captain Galloway was a native of Florida; that he enjoyed the especial confidence of General Asboth and other officers both of the Army and Navy; that he was denominated and treated as a captain of cavalry prior to his capture; and it also further appears that the said Company E was duly mustered on the 26th day of April, 1864, and as appears from the records of the War Department had at that time a sufficient number of men enrolled to entitle them to the muster-in of a captain.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill giving to the petitioner the pay and emoluments of a captain of cavalry from April 26, 1864, to August 31, 1865.

Mr. DUNNELL. This bill has the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Claims. I move that it be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

MARTIN KALBFLEISCH'S SONS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1578) for the relief of Martin Kalbfleisch's Sons.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Martin Kalbfleisch's Sons the sum of $5,241.28, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full payment for acids furnished the United States assay office, in the city of New York, in the years 1869 and 1870.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and papers of Martin Kalbfleisch's Sons, praying to be allowed the sum of $5,241.28 for acids furnished the assay office, in the city of New York, in the year 1869, beg leave to report:

That for more than forty years last past the claimants, a reputable and well-known business firm, have been manufacturers of and dealers in chemicals in said city; and for many years, and ever since the establishment of the assay office in said city, the claimants had supplied nearly or quite all the acids used by said assay office, amounting in value to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

That prior to June, 1869, they had for many years dealt with and furnished acids on the order of one George F. Dunning, who was then, and for a long time had been, the superintendent of said office; and that on or about the 25th day of June, 1869, the claimants received an official communication from said superintendent, as follows:

UNITED STATES ASSAY OFFICE,
New York, June 25, 1869.

GENTLEMEN: For the purpose of guarding against any interference in our supply of acids, I deem it prudent to give you an order for at least $5,000 worth of nitric acid, to be delivered from time to time, as we may require.

Please send me receipted bills, as follows:

June 30, say	$2,000
July 10, say	1,400
July 20, say	1,600
	5,000

Very respectfully,

GEO. F. DUNNING,
Superintendent.

Messrs. MARTIN KALBFLEISCH'S SONS,
55 Fulton Street, New York.

That a day or two subsequently Mr. Dunning called in person at the business office of the claimants, and requested receipted bills, in pursuance of the said order, directing that they be made for the following amounts and dates; which were accordingly so made, and delivered to him, viz:

Bill, date June 29, 1869, for	$1,776
Bill, date July 12, 1869, for	1,776
Bill, date July 26, 1869, for	1,440
Total	4,992

Mr. Dunning promising that claimants should be paid as the acids should be delivered.

It had long been the practice, in dealings between the said assay office and the claimants, for the former to request and receive from the claimants, when so requested, receipted bills for goods to be subsequently delivered; the claimants supposing that the office desired such bills in advance, in order to expedite the adjustment and allowance of their bills and the disbursement of money thereon.

That, in fact, no acids were delivered to the assay office on the said 25th day of June under said order; but subsequently and up to December, 1869, the claimants delivered acids to said office from time to time as directed by its superintendent, and in accordance with his said order of June 25, for which acids, so delivered, the petitioners received payment in full to said December 1, on warrants drawn in the usual manner.

That during the month of December, 1869, the claimants furnished and delivered to said assay office, from time to time, acids to the value of $1,875, for which they have not been paid.

That late in the same December it transpired that George F. Dunning, superintendent of said assay office, had defaulted, and that there were many irregularities discovered in his accounts with the Government; whereupon he was immediately removed from said office and subsequently indicted; and that upon the examination of his said accounts it appeared that by means of false certificates, drawn and indorsed upon said receipted bills, he had received from the United States Treasury the full amount of said $4,992 embraced in his order for acids of June 25 preceding, which (with a balance of $13.24, overpaid claimants on former settlement) appeared on the books of his office as a payment made to claimants, showing a sum paid them of $5,005.24 beyond all credits for acids delivered. For this amount Hon. Charles J. Folger, assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, (into whose hands the accounts of the defaulting superintendent were placed,) made claim upon the claimants. The claimants at once informed Mr. Folger that they had not received any payment whatever on account of said sum; and that the assay office was at this time indebted to them in the sum of $1,875 for acids delivered under Dunning's orders. Mr. Folger declined to accept any statement contrary to the facts as shown by the books in his possession, and threatened suit against the claimants for recovery of the amount thus shown to be due from them; whereupon the claimants, desirous of avoiding any controversy which might injure their long-established relations and interrupt their dealings with the assay office, and being advised that they would waive no legal rights thereby, under protest, entered into an agreement with Mr. Folger for the temporary adjustment of the matter, which was duly accepted by him, as per the following letter:

OFFICE OF THE BUSHWICK CHEMICAL WORKS,
55 Fulton Street, corner Cliff Street, New York, December 29, 1869.

DEAR SIR: We are advised that in the matter of $5,005.74 involved in the indebtedness of G. F. Dunning, late superintendent of your office, we are not and cannot be held accountable to the United States. Wishing, however, to give every possible assurance of our willingness to respond even to a doubtful obligation rather than suffer under any imputations injurious to our commercial honor, and with the understanding that our account is not to be sent to the district attorney, we have decided to offer you the following proposition for a present settlement of the proposed claim.

First. We will hand you our receipted bills for the acid already delivered to the assay office, amounting to the sum of $1,875.03.

Secondly. We will also give you our written obligation to deliver to the assay office at such times and in such quantities, acids at market rates, as may be required by the melter and refiner, and to the amount of $——, making, in all, $5,005.34.

In making this settlement, however, we desire it to be distinctly understood that we do not admit the legality of the claim of the United States, nor to surrender or prejudice our rights in the premises.

Yours, very truly,

MARTIN KALBFLEISCH'S SONS.

Hon. C. J. FOLGER,
Treasurer United States Assay Office, New York.

And at the same time the claimants inclosed a communication as follows:

OFFICE OF THE BUSHWICK CHEMICAL WORKS,
55 Fulton Street, corner of Cliff Street, New York, December 29, 1869.

We hereby agree to deliver to the United States assay office, at such times and in such quantities as may be required by the melter and refiner of said office, nitric and sulphuric acids, at market prices, to the value of $3,130.21, for the purposes and under the conditions set forth in our letter of this date to you.

Yours truly,

MARTIN KALBFLEISCH'S SONS.

Hon. C. J. FOLGER,
Treasurer United States Assay Office.

That this temporary settlement was with the mutual understanding between Mr. Folger and the claimants that they waived no right to payment for the acids, to the amount of $1,875, then delivered, and for the $3,130.24 in acids to be subsequently delivered; that, pursuant to said agreement, claimants furnished and delivered to said assay office acids which, with those previously furnished, amount in value, at market rates, to the sum of $5,241.28, as per statement marked A, hereto attached, for which the committee find no payment in whole or in part has ever been made to the claimants, nor to any person by them or either of them authorized to receive the same; that the receipted bills aforesaid, for the several sums of $1,776, $1,776, and $1,440, respectively, are, except as to dates and amounts, in substantially the same and in the usual form, and on which Treasury warrants No. 160, No. 179, and No. 190 were respectively drawn.

That the bill for $1,776, dated June 29, 1869, is as follows:

On which is countersigned, (as on the other bills:)

G. F. D., Superintendent.

And attached to which is a warrant drawn by the superintendent, as follows:

Warrant No. 160. ORDINARY EXPENSES. $1,776

To the Treasurer of the United States Assay Office:

Pay to M. Kalbfleisch's Sons, or order, $1,776, being for ordinary expenses according to the bill rendered by the party above named, and for so doing this shall be your warrant.

Dated at the United States assay office, New York, June 29, 1869.

GEO. F. DUNNING, Superintendent.

And at the foot of said warrant (as on the two other warrants drawn) appears a receipt, as follows:

Received June 29, 1869, of the treasurer of the assay office, the above amount, in full satisfaction for the bill aforesaid.

PATRICK BAGAR.

That the claimants submitted their case in 1871 to the Treasury Department for allowance and payment, which the Comptroller declined, for reasons not appearing in his letter before the committee, but obviously for the reason that receipted bills were furnished as above set forth. The Committee on Claims, at the last session of the Forty-second Congress, held correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Treasury, and with the melter and refiner of the assay office in New York, on the subject of this claim, and letters and statements from all of said officers appear in the files of the case, whereby it is shown that the facts as above set forth are not controverted, but admitted, and that the Government has no other or different evidence of payment beyond the prima facie proof furnished by said receipts.

From all the evidence in the case, regarding especially the high character and integrity established for the claimants, and the reliability of their sworn statements, your committee are satisfied that no payment was made to the claimants at the time of the transaction, or has since been made to them, or to any person authorized to receive the same. It stands admitted by the assay office that since Dunning's administration no change in the status of the claim has taken place, except under the stipulation with Mr. Folger, the assistant treasurer.

The proofs, then, show—

1st. That the superintendent of the assay office ordered the goods in an official communication in writing, addressed to the claimants, and therein requested that receipted bills be given, the acids to be delivered from time to time as thereafter directed.

2d. That this official order was given (in the words of the superintendent) "to guard against any interference in the supply of acids" at the assay office.

3d. That such was the usual and customary course of dealings between the claimants and that office, namely, for the office to request, and for the claimants to furnish when requested, receipted bills for goods actually ordered to be subsequently delivered as called for.

4th. That in the present instance the acids of the kinds and quantities so ordered were set apart and held for delivery to said office, as thereafter directed.

The force of a receipt is, to be sure, prima facie evidence of payment; but the presumption established by it is, in the opinion of your committee, satisfactorily overcome by the proofs in the case. It is not claimed by any one that there was any bad faith on part of claimants, nor collusion with the defaulting superintendent, nor that they were guilty of any illegal or prohibited act. It is plain that claimants placed reliance upon the integrity of a Government official sworn to an honest and faithful performance of official duty. Nor was the practice of requesting receipted bills in advance of payment peculiar to the assay office. Your committee are confident that like practices then existed and now prevail in different Departments of the Government, and notably among these is that in the settlement of pensions and bounty and back-pay cases duplicate receipts are invariably given in advance of payment, and in many instances left "in blank" for the disbursing officers to fill up on final allowance.

In the present case the large quantities of acids consumed would require only a brief time to exhaust the amount contained in the bills referred to, and there was no such unusual circumstance connected with this transaction as to prompt any apprehension or suspicion of improper motives in Superintendent Dunning by any wrongful use of the bills rendered.

But it appears that, however unwarranted the claimants were in delivering said bills, their act alone and of itself did not and could not furnish to the defaulting superintendent the means of drawing from the Treasury the amount in question.

By the regulations of the New York assay office then in force, and prescribed by the treasury Department, "a requisition for all supplies by the proper officer was first required to be made, stating the article and price, and, if approved, an order therefor was to be issued, and the articles so delivered were required to be compared with such order, as to quantity, quality, and price, and the bills in duplicate were required to be examined and certified to be correct, and, when so certified, a warrant issued for their payment." "This warrant (with the bills) to be placed in the treasurer's hands, and, when payment is demanded, the duplicate bills are to be receipted by the party to whom the payment is due, or by some one authorized in writing to receive the same, and a receipt taken at the foot of the warrant."

Under these regulations above quoted it was the practice of the melter and refiner of said office to certify to the correctness of bills for acids and other supplies; but, in the present case, the treasurer paid over to the superintendent the amount of the bills named, regardless of the absence of such required certificate. Had the regulations been observed in respect to said bills, no money should have gone to the superintendent in the absence of the melter and refiner's counter-certificate of their correctness, namely, as to "quantity, quality, and price." Nor were duplicate bills ever furnished, as required by said regulations.

It will be seen, moreover, that the money was not obtained by Superintendent Dunning on these receipted bills, but on the certificate by him drawn, addressed to the treasurer of the assay office directing payment to be made, for which "this (meaning the certificate) shall be your (meaning the treasurer's) warrant."

So the furnishing the receipted bills could have worked no possible disadvantage or injury to the Government, where, as the case plainly shows, the money was not drawn on them, but drawn on an entirely different document, namely, a warrant improperly given by the agent of the Government.

But this irregularity is not so formidable to the Government as one that appears by the receipts to the warrants themselves in respect to final payment, copies of which warrants and receipts having been furnished by the Comptroller at the request of said former committee.

These warrants are each and all made payable to "M. Kalbfleisch's Sons or order," and that they have not been so paid not only appears by claimants' own positive testimony, corroborated by the affidavit of the late Superintendent Dunning, and the admissions of the assay office, ("except as evidenced by their receipts,") but the fact appears by an examination of the warrants themselves, payable only to M. Kalbfleisch's Sons or order, but signed by one "Patrick Bagar," not by claimants' authority, or order, or in their behalf, as attorney, agent, or otherwise. Nor is there any showing by the assay office (which has been called upon for all facts and papers bearing on the case) that such Patrick Bagar had, or professed to have, any authority whatever to take the money and receipt therefor for the claimants. The regulations above referred to required that such authority, if existing, should be in writing.

There is no doubt in the mind of your committee that the late Superintendent George F. Dunning embezzled this money obtained on false certificates of his own, and paid to him from the treasury of the assay office thereon. He was removed from said office, was indicted, and, as the committee is informed, has since been convicted. He has given an affidavit in the case, admitting all essential facts with reference to this claim, and states positively that the claimants were paid nothing on the bills in question up to the time of his removal.

To conclude, your committee find that acids were furnished the assay office in New York by the petitioners, in the year 1869, to the amount of $5,241.28, for which they have not been paid, and they report the accompanying bill for their relief, and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

JOSEPH J. PETRI.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4579) for the relief of Joseph J. Petri.

The bill was read. It appropriates, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, to be paid to Joseph J. Petri, of the State of Illinois, in recognition of his heroic and successful efforts in rescuing from starvation and impending death a train of emigrants snowed-in between the Sierra Nevada and Trinity Mountains in the months of November and December, 1849, and in payment of the expenses and losses incurred by him in the same.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the especial attention of the House to the report in this case.

The report was read, as follows:

Your committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 678) for the relief of Joseph J. Petri, with the accompanying papers, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

The following facts are set forth in the petition of the claimant, and sworn to by him:

March 4, 1849, leaving his family in Palestine, he started for California, being among the very first to go overland after the breaking out of the gold fever. Saint Joseph, Missouri, was the place of rendezvous. On the 2d of May a party of two hundred and forty persons, among whom were fourteen families, set out, with seventy-one wagons, for the journey over the plains. This party was made up from Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri. At Fort Kearney officers were elected to conduct them over the plains, Mr. Petri being third in command. They left Fort Kearney May 11, and arrived at Fort Laramie July 13. Here the party halted a few days for rest and repairs, where one of the men, Karl Troube, died of the cholera. At Green River, about twenty-five miles east of Salt Lake, it was determined to take what was known as the Lawson route, which was the farthest north of any route known. It was described in the guide-book as being five hundred miles shorter than any other, but it proved to be one thousand miles longer. The progress from this time was very slow, and some of the more active men became dissatisfied, and about thirty of them, under the lead of Mr. Petri, separated from the main party, and pushed through on the same route, arriving at Davis's ranch, in the Sacramento Valley, about the 12th of September. The main party, after enduring great hardships and abandoning all their property, arrived on the 4th of November, in an exhausted condition. The men who accompanied Mr. Petri had gone immediately to mining, on their arrival, in the Feather River diggings. Many of them were very successful, Mr. Petri himself having secured about $15,000 in gold before the main party arrived. All were making preparations for winter as best they could with their scanty stock of provisions, when news was received that a large party of emigrants were snow-bound on the waters of Deer Creek, between the Sierra Nevada and Trinity Mountains. The news was brought by Captain Peopels, of the United States Army, who had been sent from Pueblo with a squad of men to aid the emigrants. His men all perished in the snow, except Lieutenant Foster, without reaching the emigrants, and Captain Peopels was so far exhausted that he died soon after bringing the news into the Sacramento Valley.

Governor Burnett, of California, immediately issued a proclamation calling for volunteers, and promising remuneration to any person who should carry relief to the emigrants. Twenty-four men volunteered, but only fourteen assembled at the place of rendezvous at the time agreed upon for their departure, November 27. Three of these were vaqueras, or cowherds, who in this case, were Indians with a slight admixture of Spanish blood. The entire provision for the party was nine mules, nine head of cattle, two sacks of barley, two hundred pounds of flour, and a sack of coffee.

Thomas Ford, of Missouri, was chosen to command the expedition. All except four of the cattle and five of the mules were purchased by Mr. Petri, and more food would have been taken, but it could not be obtained. On the second day seven of the men refused to go farther. On the third day Captain Ford and all the other white men gave up in despair, leaving Mr. Petri and the three Indians, who all resolved to take relief to the sufferers or perish in the attempt. The distance was about one hundred and twenty miles. The plan adopted was to slaughter a beef at intervals and hang it on a tree for food on the return. For nine days they made good progress, when they came to snow so deep that it was necessary for the men to go forward and tramp it down before the mules could make their way through it. Five days were spent in this manner. On ascending Trinity Mountain they found less snow and made greater progress. From the top of Trinity Mountain, Mr. Petri believed, from his recollection of the route, that the emigrants were not more than ten or twelve miles distant. Here he slaughtered the last of the cattle, and had a beef and a half and all the flour and coffee packed on the mules, and for several days the party passed on through the deepening snow, and a little before sundown on the 21st of December they found a camp of seventy starving emigrants; among these were twelve women and twenty-one children. The women were calm and easily controlled, but the men were half crazed and presented a wild and haggard appearance. Mr. Petri soon found that their food was entirely exhausted, having eaten all their horses and cattle, except such as had wandered off and were buried in the snow. These they continued to eat as long as they could find them by the tracks of the wolves and other wild beasts, but they had seemingly all left that part of the country on account of the snow. Mr. Petri found one large, fleshy man tied to a tree in the midst of the camp. Upon inquiring the cause, the other men reluctantly admitted that they had taken advantage of and tied him, because he was the most fleshy, as their next chance for food if no relief came. Upon being released he cried like a child. He was a lawyer by the name of James White, and was from Indianapolis, Indiana. Mr. Petri says that the Indians were miracles of patient endurance and obedience, never failing to come to his assistance when called. He says they resolutely refused food that the children might have it, when he knew they were almost famishing; and ever after, on meeting him, would express their love for him by saying "Massa Jo, brave man."

Mr. Petri had all the flour baked on the first night after finding them, and put in sacks to feed the children on their return. Three of the strongest men made an attempt to take the bread for themselves, but a blast from his whistle brought the Indians promptly to his relief, and the men were brought under control and tied. They were released next day, under promise that they would submit to his directions, and were obedient to the end of the journey. From the blankets in camp sacks were made large enough to hold two or three children each, and then thrown across the mules. In that way they were conveyed, and, by the older persons walking, the whole party were rescued from what came so near being a living sepulcher. After they took up their line of march one woman was found in a wagon near the route, which made seventy-one persons rescued by the one white man and three Indians. They arrived in Sacramento Valley January 9, 1850, where the whole party was received with the wildest demonstrations of rejoicing by the emigrants who had made the journey safely.

After arriving in the valley and purchasing more food at enormous prices, for the famished emigrants, Mr. Petri found his money exhausted, and after the excitement had subsided he was taken sick, from which he but slowly recovered. On being restored to health he commenced blacksmithing. He remained in California nearly three years, but never again met with success equal to that of the first six weeks, nearly all of which he had so generously expended in his heroic efforts to save the lives of his fellow-men. On the 2d of August, 1852, he started home, via the Isthmus of Panama, and joined his family on the 16th of September.

Mr. Petri has had eight children and two grandchildren, but they have all passed away, and his faithful wife died also February 19, 1872, and he is now all alone.

The foregoing statement is sustained by the affidavit of J. O. Harness and seven other citizens of Illinois; also by the affidavit of James T. Stark; also by the affidavit of Thomas Bennet, of the same State. The Legislature of California in 1851 passed a memorial to Congress asking remuneration for the claimant.

The Legislature of Illinois, in 1871, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring herein,) That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use all necessary and honorable efforts to secure an early and favorable consideration by Congress of the memorial of the said Joseph J. Petri for the services rendered and expenses incurred by him as aforesaid, whereby men, women, and children were rescued from a horrible death and from privation and suffering of the most revolting character."

The bill calls for an appropriation of thirty thousand dollars ($30,000) to compensate the petitioner "for his personal efforts and money expended by him in rescuing from starvation and impending death a train of emigrants who were snowed-in between the Sierra Nevada and Trinity Mountains, in the months of November and December, 1849."

Your committee recommend that the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000) be appropriated and paid to Joseph J. Petri, in recognition of his sublime heroism in the rescue of seventy souls from a certain and terrible death in the Sierra Nevada Mountains in November and December, 1849, and report the accompanying bill as a substitute.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, the report states perhaps as fully as I shall be able to do the facts in this case. The committee were unanimous in recommending the passage of the bill. In view of the fact that this man was induced to undertake this great enterprise under a proclamation of the acting governor of the then Territory of California, and as he so successfully accomplished the object for which he started out, it seemed to the committee that Congress could do no better act than appropriate $5,000 (the amount asked was $30,000) as a recognition of one of the most clearly proved instances of moral heroism of which we have any account. Mr. Petri underwent great sufferings and privations, and rescued seventy souls from impending peril—yes, from death itself.

It seems to me that the Government owes something to a man who thus steps forward under such circumstances and rescues so many fellow-beings from peril and from death. If one man were announced to us as having carried a fort in which there were seventy enemies of the country, or if one man were heralded to the world as having slaughtered seventy men in battle, we would vote him a medal; we would grant him a reward; we would give him promotion. But here is a case in which a man rescued from death seventy-one of his fellow-creatures. While there may be no particular law for this case, I think Congress can afford to vote this old man, who has made this country his home and has become an adopted citizen, a recognition of a display of heroism on his part such as has rarely been recorded in the history of the world.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, it is always a thankless task to resist the granting by Congress to any one who has performed a meritorious or humane action anything that his friends may ask Congress to give to him. Within the last five minutes I have been more importuned by gentlemen, in whom I have every confidence, and whom I hold in high respect, not to oppose this bill than I have been in respect of any private bill that has come to my notice within the last session or two; and if I do oppose it it is only because I am constrained to regard it as beyond the proper province of congressional legislation, and as establishing a dangerous precedent.

I begin, sir, by frankly admitting, to any degree that the gentleman who reports this bill may desire, not only the meritorious character, but the extraordinary heroism of the man for whose relief for services rendered twenty-five years ago this bill is reported; but I say further that there has not been money enough in the Treasury during the last ten years to pay a fitting reward for all the acts of heroism by citizens of the United States voluntarily performed since the year 1849. We have not had, and we cannot have, millions enough in our Treasury to pay an adequate reward in money for such services.

But the difficulty beyond this is that we have not any right, as I think, to make payment for services like these at all. It would be contrary to the whole principle upon which government is established and for which it ought to be continued. The business of government is not to give bounties but to maintain justice. The money that we propose to distribute is not our money but the money of the people. What is given in this way is taken from the whole people. I desire to know, then, upon what principle of law gentlemen can put their hands into the pockets of the people and take therefrom money to reward men for "acts of heroism." The Constitution wisely left it for gentlemen to put their hands into their own pockets when they would return money rewards for such high action.

This claimant was not in the service of the Government, neither in the Army nor the Navy. He went out upon the call of the governor of California, and ought to have received from that governor remuneration for his services. How happens it that great and rich State of the Pacific coast has not rewarded this man, who was employed by its executive officer for this extraordinary service? How happens it for twenty-five years after the rescue of these lives upon the call of the governor of California he is here knocking at our doors for compensation for his heroism? To that I wait for a reply.

But, Mr. Chairman, whatever the answer to that, the question recurs whether we should begin to pay bounties to anybody for exhibitions of heroism. If we pay in the case of this man Petri, the precedent will reach to the case of every one who rescues lives from burning houses in Boston, in New York, or in any other part of these States. It will reach to every man who may go into the surf upon the New Jersey and North Carolina coasts to rescue women and children from wrecked vessels, who stops runaway horses, warns against falling stones or timber, or saves in any way the lives of citizens. If Congress once begins the business of paying such bounties there will be no end of it so long as there is heroism and people to perform heroic acts left in the country, and I trust those at least will last forever.

Surely it cannot be just to do this thing. There is no provision of law to authorize it. There was no authority on the part of the governor of California, so far as this Government is concerned, to employ this man for the United States to do this act of heroism, and it does not appear he was employed for the United States. It was a very gallant and heroic act I gladly grant, but nevertheless it was an act for which the Government is not liable—that is not pretended—but a private service, which we are asked to reward by a gratuity on the part of the people. My notion of government is that its duty is first to maintain justice. On the one hand, men should not be left knocking for years and years at the doors of Congress with just claims. And on the other hand, men should not be supported in coming to Congress to make private claims for services unauthorized by law and which we are not bound to pay for, no matter how heroic and gallant they may be, or how strongly the service may appeal to our sympathies. This is a case which no man if appealed to personally should refuse to join in providing for by private subscription. But according to my judgment, it calls for a gratuity by Congress which should not be granted by this House, solely because the money to be granted is the money of the people, not intrusted to Congress for such purposes.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I have a very few words to say in regard to this matter, which, in my judgment, is as meritorious a claim as was ever presented to the American Congress; and I take issue with my friend from New York [Mr. POTTER] when he takes the position that we have no right and it is unprecedented to pay a claim of this kind.

He asks why Mr. Petri has not been compensated by the State of California? It must be remembered that in 1849 California was a Territory of the United States, and had not then been admitted into the Union as a State.

Governor Burnett, I believe, was territorial governor at that time. The attractive golden discoveries had recently been made, and our people were rushing from all parts of the country through the intervening wilderness between the settled portions of the Mississippi Valley to the golden regions recently discovered upon the shores of the Pacific. The sufferings, the hardships, and the privations of the pioneers then emigrating to California were almost unparalleled. It must be remembered that an unexplored wilderness of two thousand miles in breadth intervened; dreary deserts, almost impassable mountains, the dangers of a savage foe, and almost every species of danger and hardship, were to be overcome.

The case before us is one of an extraordinary character. Nothing short of an act of the most extraordinary generosity, involving the sublimest heroism, could have rescued the perishing emigrants. That this was furnished by Petri is well established by the most unquestionable evidence. This case comes from no obscure corner. Petri is well known and is indorsed by some of the most prominent citizens of Illinois, including the well-known ex-Governor Palmer, ex-Auditor Jesse K. Dubois, one of the best men and best-known men in the whole West; General Lippincott, an ex-member of this House and the present auditor of the State of Illinois, who was in California at the time of this heroic act, and who, during last session, gave me much valuable information in regard thereto. He assured me that it was a matter of common notoriety that Petri had rendered this extraordinary service. This man Petri, whose fault, if any he had, was that he had a heart so generous and expansive that it reached out and embraced the whole human race in its generous impulses, would not permit him to rest in his bed while seventy human beings were perishing in the gorges of the mountains. And now we are told that this Congress has no power to remunerate him for doing what it was the duty of the Government to do—rescue these citizens within its own territory from impending destruction.

If now, or at any time, it was made clear to the American Congress that one hundred or any number of citizens were in the gorges of the mountains in deadly peril, or upon the ocean waves shipwrecked and perishing, and we had the means to rescue them by making an appropriation to send them assistance and relief, I would like to know whether, in such case, the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] would place his herculean form and great influence in the pathway of this generous and imperative act and duty on our part, and insist that we had no right or power to make such an appropriation; that it would be improper on our part to intervene to save the lives of these citizens? I am sure that he would shrink back with horror from the performance of a task so ungracious and so indefensible. And yet when this noble-hearted and brave citizen stepped in with his whole fortune, and at the risk of his life, and did that which it was the duty of the Government to do if it had had the necessary information and power to do it, the honorable gentleman urges, with all his ability and great influence here, that Congress has no power to vote him this paltry and very imperfect compensation. In my judgment, instead of ingratitude and opposition here for this heroic and generous act, he is entitled not merely to compensation, but in any heroic age he would have had monuments and statues voted to perpetuate his memory.

The heroism of the greatest and most distinguished men in our armies does not equal that of this humble German-American citizen. I happen to know him personally, although he is not a resident of my district. He does not even now speak distinctly and accurately the English language, but he has a warm American heart in his bosom, and is an honor to our country and our race. Why has he not been paid?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire what has been done or supposed to be done for the Indians who accompanied Petri?

Mr. MARSHALL. What became of the Indians accompanying him I do not know. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will only espouse their cause and bring forward a claim for them, I will very gladly support it. Petri does not know, and I do not know, what became of those Indians. They furnished but their services, while Petri gave his whole fortune and also risked his life in the enterprise. When he came back to his camp from rescuing these citizens he was taken seriously ill, and in the condition things were in then in California, it is not surprising that on his recovery he found that these men had all dispersed to all parts of the country. After this he did not succeed well in mining, and went back to his business of blacksmithing. He remained in California for three or four years, and, not prospering, returned to Illinois. The Legislature of Illinois has unanimously memorialized Congress on the subject; and now, Mr. Chairman, this man, this German-American citizen, in his old age and penury, comes before Congress, and the Committee on Claims unanimously report a bill that is but an imperfect, a very imperfect, compensation to him for his personal sacrifices and the money he expended at the time.

Now, if one hundred American citizens were to-day among the gorges of the mountains perishing who would withhold money to rescue them to save their lives? The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] will not, I hope, deny that it would be our duty under such circumstances to provide the money. And yet when an American citizen performs this duty, at the risk of his own life, and expends his whole fortune in the work, his humble claim is met by the powerful opposition of my friend from New York. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am amazed at this. It would be disgraceful, in my judgment, to the American Congress if they refused to make this small compensation for services so extraordinary and so meritorious.

I believe I should not detain the committee by attempting to say anything further on this subject. I was not aware until an hour ago that the bill had been reported and would be brought before the House this day. The evidence, as it appears in the report which has been submitted, is not entirely as complete as the evidence that is before the committee, nor as complete as it would be if this man were in a position to prosecute his claim in a regular and formal manner before Congress.

I am asked by a friend near me if I have any personal knowledge of the character of the evidence. I know some of these witnesses to be gentlemen of reputation. I know Petri myself, and he has the certificate of ex-Governor Palmer, of our State, of the ex-auditor of our State, Jesse K. Dubois, of the present auditor, Mr. Lippincott, and of other gentlemen of as high character and standing as any in our State or in the country, that he is a man of integrity and irreproachable reputation. I have not a particle of doubt of the justice of the claim. If this bill is not passed I know of no claim that ought to receive the sanction of this House.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. MAYNARD took the chair, as Speaker pro tempore, to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 14) in relation to bounties;

A bill (S. No. 68) for the relief of Hiram Prather, late lieutenant-colonel Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry; and

A bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey.

The message also informed the House that the President of the Senate pro tempore had appointed Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, on the part of the Senate, a member of the joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the government of the District of Columbia, in place of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, excused.

JOSEPH J. PETRI.

The Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar resumed its session.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this case should be separated from some of the incidents that have been mentioned in connection with it. For instance, the fact that this man is a German-American citizen does not put his claim on any higher ground than if he could not be so described. The fact also that this Petri is an old man does not necessarily make his claim a proper claim against the Treasury of the United States. The fact that he is a poor man does not necessarily give the Congress of the United States the right or the power to relieve his necessities. The fact that he is the only one left of his family, that his wife and children are dead, does not give him any right that he would not have if his family were all alive. But, Mr. Chairman, in the view in which the case is presented here by the committee in the report, these facts are put aside entirely, because we are asked to give this person out of the Treasury of the United States $5,000 in recognition of an act of heroism. That is the language of the report.

Now, sir, the facts in this case, as I have gathered them from the report, so far as they are pertinent to the inquiry, it seems to me, are these: A party of overland emigrants in 1849, at the time when persons were seeking their fortunes in the mining regions in California, were snow-bound, and intelligence came to this Petri and others that they were in distress, and that an expedition should be organized to go to their relief. The State of California, through the governor, issued a proclamation, which is recited in the report, calling for volunteers, and promising remuneration to any person who should carry relief to the emigrants; so that, so far as this report establishes any liability on the part of any government to recognize this as an act of heroism, or to remunerate these persons for any expense that they may have incurred or any hardships that they may have endured, it is the State of California which has put itself in that attitude.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would rather be allowed to proceed without interruption.

The proclamation was made by Governor Burnett, of California; I do not know whether California was then in the Union or not. But he promised the reward. What I was going to observe was this: this is simply and in no respect different from any act of heroism; that is all there is of it. If any gentleman of this House should have word brought to him, while at home in his State, that some persons were snow-bound and in distress, and he should start out for their relief at some peril and expense, I know of no reason why that person should come here and ask either a recognition of his act as an act of heroism, or a reward in the nature of compensation for that act.

Sir, that makes acts of heroism cheap. If every person is to come to the Congress of the United States, who performs a noble act, every time he goes out at the call of humanity to the rescue of a fellow-citizen who is in suffering and distress, if he is to come here and estimate his heroism by the yard, or by dollars and cents, and ask compensation for it from the Treasury of the United States, it would make heroism, instead of a noble act, as characterized by this committee, simply a mean and miserly matter of dollars and cents.

We have never thought proper at any time to measure these acts of heroism in this way, even if we had the power. During this session we passed a joint resolution encouraging the heroic act of some seamen in saving the lives of persons who had been shipwrecked. But it never occurred to the mover of that proposition, I think—it certainly never occurred to the House—that we should compensate those persons by giving them a pecuniary reward out of the Treasury of the United States.

Even suppose that we had the inclination to do this; suppose this was an act which appealed to us, and we had the inclination to do what is now asked, what right have we to do it? What right have we to take the money that belongs to the people of the United States, that is in the Treasury of the United States in trust for certain specific purposes—what right have we to take that money and vote it away as a testimonial for acts of individual heroism that are occurring every day?

In the early settlement of that country the pioneers were every day giving the highest evidence of heroism; they were every day going to the relief of their fellows at the peril of life and at great expense. But that is no reason why we should take money from the Treasury of the United States and vote it to them as a recognition of that service. There is no provision in the Constitution, there is no authority of law, there is no warrant in the principles of our government, for voting money out of the Treasury of the United States for any such purpose as this.

Now I recognize that this gentleman is as much entitled to recognition of this sort for this heroic act as any one whose case can properly be brought before us. It was undoubtedly a grand and noble work of heroism on his part. But if we recognize this as a proper claim to be considered and compensated by us, there are hundreds of thousands of similar claims that will be continually appealing to our sympathies. There are other persons who engaged in this same expedition.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. For a question.

Mr. BECK. I want to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] if he does not think it as constitutional and meritorious to vote $5,000 to a man who saved the lives of seventy people when nobody else would, as it was to give a pension to a duck-hunter, as we did this morning.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I did not vote for a pension to a duck-hunter; I am not responsible for that act of legislation. I do not know how the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] voted upon it. I think myself that this is as meritorious an act as was the act of the person who had a pension given him for losing his arm by an accident while shooting ducks. If we go on the scale of merit I have no doubt that this case is as meritorious as that. But that person was in the service of the United States. I do not understand that this person was in the service of the United States in any sense whatever. He was not doing this in the cause of the United States. The United States were under no obligation to protect these overland emigrants from the peril of weather, and to rescue them in case they were snow-bound.

Mr. CLEMENTS. This man was there acting under the call of the provisional governor of California, who was an officer of the United States.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. A sufficient answer to that is to say that the governor of California had no authority to offer this reward, so far as the United States was concerned. As I say, the United States were in no sense bound to relieve these persons from the distress they were in. The United States were not bound to send persons to their aid or to rescue them from this peril. The United States were in no respect under any obligation to bear this expense. If we recognize any claim in this case we do so simply on the broad principle (and I desire the committee to understand it) that the Treasury of the United States is at the service of every man within the limits of the United States who shall do what Congress may conclude to be an "act of heroism," and that every such person may come here asking to be compensated for his time and expenses, and, beyond that, to have a gratuity voted to him because of his having done an "act of heroism."

Mr. MAYNARD. Have we not again and again rewarded foreigners who upon the high seas have rescued our citizens from shipwreck?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. We occasionally vote them testimonials. As I said at the outset of my remarks, we the other day recognized the gallant conduct of some seamen in rescuing shipwrecked sailors from death by drowning. But we did not recognize that conduct by any vote of money out of the Treasury of the United States. We thanked them publicly for their gallant conduct. That is a recognition that we are able to give. I do not mean to say that I favor such a recognition because it is cheaper.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the persons whose services were recognized the other day had expended any money in that service?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not know that they had; but in answer to that question it is enough to say that the committee do not report anything as compensation in this case. They saw at once that there was no warrant in the Constitution or the law for reporting a compensation. The recommendation of the committee in their report is, that "$5,000 be appropriated and paid to Joseph J. Petri in recognition of his sublime heroism." The committee do not base their action upon the fact that this man has expended $5,000, or $10,000, or $30,000.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me say a word upon another point. We have presented here, in behalf of the passage of this bill, a joint resolution of the Legislature of Illinois, requesting the Representatives from that State and instructing the Senators to support this proposition. Now, sir, I do not know much in regard to the provisions of the constitution of that State; but I presume it is just as broad as the Constitution of the United States in respect to the appropriation of money for such services as these. I suppose the Legislature of Illinois has as much power as has Congress to appropriate money in recognition of the "sublime heroism" of one of its own citizens. And it seems to me (if I may be allowed to say it) that the Legislature of Illinois, if the question had been presented to it of appropriating $5,000 for such a purpose, would have stopped and considered whether it had the authority under the constitution of that State to vote money for any such purpose. But undoubtedly there is no prohibition in the constitution of Illinois against asking Congress to appropriate money, though there was certainly a prohibition either in the constitution or in the disposition of the Legislature against its appropriating the money by its own act.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont to the wording of the bill:

> In recognition of his heroic and successful efforts in rescuing from starvation and impending death a train of emigrants snowed in between the Sierra Nevada and Trinity Mountains, in the months of November and December, 1849, and in payment of the expenses and losses incurred by him in the same.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I had not read the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. O; the gentleman had not read the bill!

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I understand the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] to say that the United States Government was not bound to send aid to these men. Now, if there had been a military commander out there, and it had been within his power to rescue these men at any cost to the Government of the United States, would it not have been his duty to do so?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. In answer to that question——

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I would inquire, Mr. Chairman, under what rule the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] is speaking? Is it under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to inform the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] that the gentleman from Vermont is speaking under the hour rule, not the five-minute rule; and he will take the liberty of stating in this connection that several gentlemen desire to speak briefly upon the question, and will be afforded an opportunity by the Chair as soon as practicable.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] I will say, that if a company of soldiers had been stationed near where these persons were snow-bound, the call of humanity would have been just as great upon them as it was upon Mr. Petri to go to their relief, and undoubtedly if they had done so the expenses that might have been thereby incurred would have come out of the general appropriations for the Army. Our military officers are not so strictly tied down in the use of the forces under their command that they cannot employ them when the occasion may demand in the service of humanity.

I have no doubt that this is as strong a case for relief as can be presented. I have no doubt that this man was actuated by as high motives, and performed as grand a work, as any hero ever did either in war or in peaceful life. I have no doubt if that we have warrant in the Constitution for recognizing such acts of heroism we have as much right, and our sympathies would urge us as strongly, to make such recognition in this case as in any other. But I do deny, Mr. Chairman, that the money in the Treasury of the United States is put there in trust for any such purpose.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the bill now under consideration, and I do not see that its passage is forbidden by any constitutional difficulty such as has been suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] It is true we have no express provision in the Constitution providing for cases of this kind. It is also true that what Congress has often done, or sometimes done, by unanimous vote, has no express provision for it in the Constitution. A few years ago we sent across the ocean a vessel laden with provisions to a starving people, and the Congress of the United States voted it unanimously. We have repeated that at one time and another in our history. Where can the gentleman draw any distinction between sending bread across the ocean and paying for services like this where seventy men were saved from death?

Then, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we have in the action of the territorial government the closest resemblance, at least an indorsement, of this in advance. Here are these people isolated from the rest of the world. They are far away from the home Government, which does not know they are in this perilous condition. The only executive officer there, the officer appointed to represent the Government in that great territory stretching along the coast for thousands of miles, that executive officer standing in the place of this Government as its representative, and the only one who could represent it, offers this aid, and suggests to any one who will relieve these starving people that they shall have compensation. Now, will the Congress of the United States, after this officer, seeing impending danger and death to those American citizens, called for this relief—will we say we will not open our Treasury and pay back to this man the money which he paid out at the suggestion of this executive officer of the Government, and for services which resulted in an act which everybody here admits to be one of remarkable heroism? It is a case unparalleled in our history. If we go back to the foundation of the Government we will not find another case in all its aspects presenting a more remarkable case of sublime heroism.

More than that, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we have recognized this very principle where we have provided, as we have done repeatedly, in cases of men who have relieved our sailors upon the high seas from impending shipwreck and death. We have not only voted medals, but we have voted, on reports of committees since I have been in this House, rewards for men who have relieved our sailors upon the high seas. We have not only voted rewards to our own men, but we have voted rewards to foreigners for saving our sailors from danger and shipwreck.

This same principle, Mr. Chairman, has been recognized in various ways. If we have the right to vote a medal of $100 in value, as we did in a case recently of the captain of the vessel who saved the lives of our sailors upon the Atlantic, we have the right to vote to the man who spent his own money in rescuing from impending death American citizens $5,000 for the service.

Mr. Chairman, until the time comes when Congress can provide against all of these dangers we must be satisfied when the Government, through its executive officers, makes an offer such as was made in this case, and when the services have been performed and the money expended, the Congress of the United States will not do so mean a thing as to refuse compensation for that service.

Mr. NEGLEY. Let me remind the gentleman from Connecticut that we purchased food during the war for the enemies of the country and to save their starving women and children.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Yes, sir; we did that, and to-morrow, if off our own coast, upon an island within our reach—if the people there were starving to death, the voice of humanity would compel us to relieve from starvation those foreigners, though it might cost us hundreds of dollars. That would not be so clear a case as this. It is not so clear, because here we have the indorsement, in addition, of this executive officer of the Government, the governor of California.

What would Congress have done at the time? Suppose we had heard by telegraph or in any other way there were seventy American citizens who were likely to perish snowed-up in the gorges of the Rocky Mountains; would we not have sent by the most speedy means of communication to any man or men in that vicinity to relieve them from their perilous position and we would pay all the expenses? Of course we would have done that, and there would not have been a vote against it. This man having done this great service at this great sacrifice to himself, shall we stand here and say it belittles him to ask for this compensation now, because he did it at the time without expectation of reward? The offer was made to him by an officer of the United States; and will gentlemen say there can be nothing like heroism when compensation is asked for a man who has already expended money to save American citizens from destruction? It seems to me there ought not to be a vote in the House against recognizing the claim of this man Petri; for I never knew since I have been in Congress a more meritorious case. It is impossible to conceive of one more meritorious. We have the authority; we have the duty imposed upon us; we have the right to recognize the service of a man like this. We have precedents for doing so, and the bill is just and proper, and ought to be passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the views expressed by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] are those which certainly commend themselves as general propositions to the judgment of the House. It is true as a general proposition that Congress is authorized to appropriate money for the purposes of Government only, but there are considerations which seem to be overlooked in this discussion.

This act of humanity on the part of this now venerable petitioner was performed, not within the limits of a State, but, on the contrary, within a district of country which was specially, and then exclusively, within the supervision and under the control of Congress. The case is certainly very different from that of a proposition to recognize by Congress an act of humanity or of heroism within the limits of a State, involving the expenditure of money. Here the lives of many persons, citizens of the United States, were at stake in one of our Territories dependent entirely on the Federal Government, and an act of heroism was performed resulting in pecuniary loss to the person who performed it, by which seventy persons, men, women, and children, were saved from starvation in the pathless gorge of the mountains. It is not necessary for me to say that there are abundant precedents for the action of Congress in such a case as this. We are feeding the destitute, every year almost, by appropriations from the public Treasury in sections of the country which are no more under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress than a Territory.

Mr. BECK. In this District.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have made such appropriations, as is suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, time and again in this District, on the ground that this District is exclusively under the legislation of Congress. We perpetuate the memories of those who have rendered valuable service to the country either in peace or in war, by appropriations from the public Treasury. And yet the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Vermont will not contend there is any express constitutional authority for this. Only to-day, sir, without a single dissenting vote—and I call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] to that—we appropriated money out of our Treasury to commemorate the heroic deeds of a gallant Frenchman who fell in the service of our Republic almost a century ago. Is there any express provision of the Constitution, or any law enacted in pursuance with that Constitution, by which such an appropriation of money could be made? But yesterday we appropriated money from the Treasury that the likeness in marble of two illustrious civilians might adorn the Capitol. Sir, we are every session of Congress doing what is proposed to be done by this bill which makes an appropriation, not simply on the ground of a gallant service to the country—for it was such; the saving of seventy American citizens from death by starvation was a noble service to the country—but because it has been shown that by this act of heroism large expenses were incurred which contributed to bring on this once heroi cadventurer, now an old man feeble and alone, want and poverty; so that there are two grounds on which this appropriation can rest—the humane heroism which saved the lives of American citizens, and the expenses incurred in the act. At the imminent peril of his own life this petitioner, with toil and suffering, performed this humane act.

Again, sir, there is in all this legislation a higher law, if I may be permitted the expression, that underlies the fabric of Government, and pervades and gives vitality to its Constitution and laws—a law not easily defined. I speak of the law of our common human nature, that pervades and animates our whole system of legislation. I should not be willing to appropriate money from the Treasury, the hard earnings of the people, in a case like this unless it commended itself strongly and clearly to our consciences as an act demanding the recognition of Government, that commended itself to the conscience of our common humanity as an act of exalted merit that should be recognized and commemorated by the nation. Why erect a monument over the grave of the gallant Frenchman in Rhode Island? Why make appropriations from the public Treasury to erect statues to citizens who have rendered themselves illustrious in our history by noble achievements in civil life, in the Army or the Navy? It is, sir, that these examples shall contribute to elevate and ennoble the nation. We cannot afford to ignore and consign to oblivion the noble, humane act, the unselfish heroism, of this private citizen. The commemoration of such deeds animates and elevates our human nature. It is for this that a government with gratitude remembers and perpetuates noble deeds "as its best treasures," that the example of them may animate the spirit of the nation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I had not expected, Mr. Chairman, to speak on this subject, and would not have done so had it not been for the remarkable speech made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] The gentleman from Vermont tells the committee that while, in his judgment, this was as meritorious a deed as can be presented to Congress, he is, nevertheless, against making this appropriation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under what circumstances have we appropriated money for the relief of our fellow-citizens? The instances are so numerous that I will not attempt to recite but a very small proportion of them. Every member of this House who has seen the regular appropriation bills go through year after year knows that we appropriate thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars every year to build light-houses upon the coast and pay money out of the Treasury to construct life-boats and to pay men to man those boats, in order to save human life; we pay away, year after year, thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars for the simple and sole purpose of saving human life.

Now, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] says that in this case, although this man with the aid of some Indians and one or two settlers, saved seventy human lives, we did not agree to pay him; we did not stipulate in the bond to pay him for his valuable services. According to the gentleman we ought to have entered into a contract with this man, when we heard that these men were in danger, and he ought not to have gone a step to save their lives until we had done so. It appears that it was reported to the committee that officers and soldiers of the United States Army started out to save these men; and when they had traveled two or three days through the snow they started back. Yet this man and those who accompanied him pressed their way through the snow-drifts when they were almost freezing, each hour and each moment, until they reached these men and delivered every one of them.

Now what further was the fact? Here was a governor of a Territory calling for persons to go to the relief of these emigrants. And who were these emigrants? Were they foreigners; were they aliens? They were citizens of the United States; some of them, perhaps, from the State of the gentleman from Vermont. They were not Californians; they were not citizens of that State or Territory; they were citizens of the American States and Territories, going west, to find homes in California. Under these circumstances the governor of that Territory, the only man in that Territory who could represent the United States, said to the people of the Territory, "I call upon you now, as a matter of humanity, to face the difficulties that lie in the way, and go and save these seventy-one human beings who are in deadly peril." And of all the men in that State this was the only man who would do it.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] says that he would not reward a man for his heroism. It is stated in the report, as in the evidence, and not denied by living man, that he not only went on this meritorious errand and periled his life, but that he spent $16,000 in money also. Yet the gentleman from Vermont would say that because there was no contract made with him by the Government of the United States, he, of all the men throughout the length and breadth of this land, shall be uncompensated and unrewarded, and his act receive no recognition by the Government of the United States. This is the position taken by the gentleman from Vermont. I have no doubt that this House will by a large vote sustain this bill, and I should be glad to see them do it by a unanimous vote.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman to inform me if the committee are prepared to state whether this man was paid any of the money which he expended for the relief of this party.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The committee have no information upon that subject. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. DUNNELL. He was never paid a dollar.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If he was ever paid, it must have been by the State of California; and certainly that State did not pay him, because it is here now memorializing Congress to compensate this man.

Mr. SHANKS. What did the three Indians get for their services in saving the lives of these seventy-one white men?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understand from the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] and from gentlemen from my State that the Indians were compensated by this man himself.

Mr. SHANKS. Were these Indians paid for their services in saving the lives of white men?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I am told that they were. I ask that this bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to say a word or two upon this subject.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. How long a time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. POTTER. Not more than five or ten minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will not object.

Mr. POTTER. I agree that this is a meritorious claim, if any claim for mere gratuity or charity can be meritorious when addressed to this Congress. It is exactly because it commends itself to the hearts and feelings and sympathies of us all that I resist it. For the duty of Congress is not to give away the people's money because a claim commends itself to our sympathies, unless it be also one of those cases that Congress has the right to pay. To pay for a claim because it appeals to our sympathy is the beginning of a class of legislation that has nearly everywhere in the United States been found to be dangerous, and in many of the States has been put an end to by the provision of the fundamental law of those States.

My learned friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] likens this case to the case of a monument to the memory of soldiers. But monuments are erected to the memory of men who were in regular public service—the Army or the Navy. Monuments, like medals, are in the nature of testimonials; they are not like this bill, payments of money for voluntary patriotic action. So in regard to the services of those who rescue our sailors in foreign lands, or rescue persons that are shipwrecked. Those services are rendered by those employed for that purpose, or reward for them may come within the necessary regulations of foreign commerce. The necessities of navigation have given rise to rules recognized by all nations, applying to conduct on the high seas, which have no application to a case like this.

But this is the case of a person called out by the governor as a simple volunteer, who the governor said would be remunerated; by whom does not appear, but not at any rate by the United States. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] also says that this is a case for the higher law. Sir, I agree there may be such cases. But what is a case for the higher law? It is one that justifies something entirely outside of the Constitution, or that excuses, it may be, a violation of the Constitution; it cannot be a case arising under the Constitution. The gentleman is right in saying this case appeals to our liberality; but I never heard that a trustee could rightfully take the funds intrusted to his charge and pay them for other than the purposes of the trust, no matter how meritorious, or how much such payment addressed itself to the hearts of men, and then say that he was justified in appropriating the trust-money to a purpose for which he had no authority to appropriate anything except his own money. Such a doctrine would destroy all right and remove all accountability. And I repeat that if Congress can rightfully pay this claimant for his gallant services performed twenty-five years ago, it can pay for every gallant action performed in all this broad land in the mean time.

I believe I am not regarded, Mr. Chairman, where I live, as less liberal than most men. And in proper cases I am probably as free to give my own money as most gentlemen are to give theirs. But, I repeat, this is a case which, however much it addresses itself to our sympathies, has no warrant in law, and I believe that to establish as a precedent for the future action of this Government such a bill as this would be one of the most dangerous acts which have been passed since I have been in public life.

Who are the gentlemen who have asked the House to pass this bill? The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY]—a State whose constitution, I understand, contains a provision prohibiting entirely this class of legislation; whose Legislature is forbidden by the wise fundamental law of that State from making this appropriation, but which yet recommends this reward of its citizens to the national Legislature, to this Federal Government, which is not a government of original powers at all, but one of delegated powers only, among which charity with other people's money is not to be found.

Beyond that we have an indorsement of the bill from the gentleman from Iowa—that State from which you, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. KASSON in the chair,) are a Representative. That State, also, by its constitution prohibits its Legislature from passing any act of this kind. And only lately the whole country has been agitated because the State of Pennsylvania found itself so far debauched by special and particular legislation of the class of bounty and privilege to which this bill belongs as to render necessary a change of its fundamental law prohibiting, I believe and hope, absolutely and forever, gratuities and bounties of every description.

Mr. Chairman, there are two kinds of legislation: one conducted by rule, one exercised through general laws, which is calculated to maintain justice, even-handed justice, without partiality and without favor, and which I declare to be the true end and purpose of government; the other dependent on discretion, conducted by special legislation, which may sometimes reward heroism, but which, in the experience of this country everywhere, has generally degenerated into corruption and abuse. We stand upon the threshold of the latter system of legislation. Choose ye, Representatives of the people, between these two systems. For myself, however liberally I might be disposed to bestow my own money in rewarding heroism, I declare that if the Congress of the United States should now begin to tread in this path of special legislation, this path must, in the end, lead to its control by the lobbies and the monopolists, and to the prevalence, in the end, of legislative demoralization and corruption. Therefore it is at the outset I raise my voice against taking even the first step, in no matter how seductive a case, in that dangerous road.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] for five minutes.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] to this language, which I think he will recognize:

> Now this man, a volunteer scout, pierced the line of the enemy at a critical juncture in the history of the war, and destroyed communication by telegraph and by rail, which led to the saving of a large quantity of rolling stock important to us, and thus rendered very material aid to the preservation of the important point at Knoxville; and the officer of all others most competent to instruct us on that point tells us that the services rendered were valuable. The claimant therefore appeals for this compensation, not to our generosity but to our justice.

Mr. POTTER. I recognize those as my words.

Mr. DUNNELL. This is the language of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] used not long ago, in behalf of the payment of a large sum of money to a scout, simply because he had saved a small quantity of rolling stock; yet to-day the gentleman refuses to vote a dollar to a man who saved not mere material wealth, but mind, soul—the lives of men, women, and children. The gentleman's attitude is inconsistent. It does discredit to his memory and his judgment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

Mr. POTTER. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to say a single word. The case to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has referred was one in which the scout was employed by a general in charge of the Army—an officer having authority under the law to employ him.

Mr. DUNNELL. He was a volunteer scout, and it was because he was a volunteer that he was employed.

Mr. POTTER. But he was employed by an officer having authority to employ him for that specific service. Therefore he was entitled to his quantum meruit. Had this scout rendered his service without authority of anybody to employ him, the cases might be alike. If the gentleman from Minnesota had read all I said on that occasion he would have seen the difference in the cases.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. While I agree with my friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] that it will not do as a principle to vote the money of the United States as rewards for heroism not performed in the service of the country, I cannot see why the expenses of this man, exceeding largely in amount the sum which the bill proposes to allow to him, are not a legitimate subject of appropriation by Congress; and I wish to adduce an illustration for the benefit of my friend from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] or any other gentleman who may have doubts on this subject.

We make an appropriation year by year to relieve and to bring home American seamen. We do this as a part of our authority to regulate the commerce of the United States. Now, I cannot see why relief afforded to suffering emigrants is not as much within the competency of congressional action as relief afforded to men upon the high seas or in foreign lands. I am not regarding this as a reward of heroism, but as compensation for expenses incurred in saving the lives of men who were within one of the Territories of the United States and under no other jurisdiction than that of our Government.

The fact that this was a volunteer service does not affect the question, as we have settled time and again. A little distance further down on this Calendar there is a bill to which my attention has been attracted, because it is in my charge—a bill presenting this case: In the absence of the regular diplomatic or consular representative, a citizen of the United States in a foreign country acted in that capacity and advanced money for the United States, receiving subsequently the approval of the Government for his conduct. He brought suit in the Court of Claims to recover the money he had advanced, and a bill to pay that claim has been unanimously reported to this House by the appropriate committee.

Mr. FORT. This bill is opposed by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] and the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] on the ground that there is no warrant of law for this appropriation, and that there is no obligation on the part of the Government to pay this money. Those points have been answered, and well answered, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] as well as by others. But the gentleman from New York has asked (and the question may have seemed to have some force) why the State of Illinois, which memorializes Congress to pay this claim, does not pay it itself. It is simply upon this point that I wish to make a reply. The State of Illinois was under no obligation to pay this man. It is true he is one of her citizens; but he was not upon her soil when the services were rendered; he was within the jurisdiction of the General Government, upon territory which was the property of the United States. And I can tell the gentleman further, as it appears by the testimony, that the persons rescued by this hero were not citizens of Illinois alone. Some of them were citizens of Missouri, some were citizens of Indiana, and of other States. For all I know there may perchance have been some precious soul from the State of New York or the State of Vermont to share in the benefit of this man's noble action.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me it is not for Illinois to say she is bound to pay this man just because he happened to be a citizen of that State, and because a few of the citizens of Illinois may have been with that party of seventy who were perishing in the icy chains of the Rocky Mountains. But they were citizens of the United States, and it occurs to me it is just as proper to pay this debt as it would be to pay the claim of any man in the State of Vermont who might risk his life in rescuing some individual from peril upon the high seas. The State of Illinois has only done by her Legislature what she had a right to do, and that was to memorialize Congress to pay this claim due to one of her citizens.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move this bill be laid aside, to be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to say a word——

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to say a word, if I am permitted to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont insists on his right to be heard.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House to any extent, and even if I did I would demand my rights. I have the floor, and have a right to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the chairman of the Committee on Claims, [Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois,] as he was in duty bound to do, to make the motion to report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understood the chairman to move the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. After he made that motion I supposed he had yielded the floor, and immediately rose to submit a few remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion had not been put, and the gentleman from Illinois still held the floor.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If I waited until the motion was put, I should have lost my right to be heard.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not object to the gentleman's being heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] yield the floor to the gentleman from Vermont any portion of his time?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If I have possession of the floor I will yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a point of order, and wish to have the Chair decide it. If a member moves a bill be reported to the House, and stops speaking after he has submitted that motion, can he still hold the floor, although another member seeks it?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion had already been made by the gentleman from Minnesota, and was still pending before the committee. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Illinois was holding the floor with a view to move that the committee rise, which is not debatable. The Chair rules that the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor until his time has expired.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois was, not that the committee rise, but that this bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, which is a debatable motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not debate unnecessarily the point of order; but the gentleman from Illinois had the right to make his motion, and to continue upon the floor for an hour to engage in debate if he chose to do so. Now does the gentleman from Illinois yield any portion of his time to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Certainly, if he desires it. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Only two or three minutes. I propose simply to say this, and I say it mainly on account of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] The report of the committee was before me—the bill was not before me. The report of the committee was, in so many words, that $5,000 be appropriated as a "recognition of the sublime heroism" of this act. I said then, as I believed, the Legislature of Illinois had the same power to make a pecuniary recognition of an act of sublime heroism as this Congress. I understand now they have changed the position in which they present this case. They say there is a contract, or something in the nature of a contract, between the Government of the United States and this man Petri, growing out of a proclamation of the governor of California, offering remuneration. Now, if gentlemen of this House look upon that as a contract, or an agreement which this House ought to carry out by voting an appropriation of $5,000 as remuneration for this act of sublime heroism, then the bill ought to be voted on in that view precisely, so as not to be brought into a precedent hereafter, and its phraseology ought to be changed so as to make that perfectly apparent. But I still adhere to the position I originally took, which has not been controverted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that Congress has no warrant for voting money in recognition of acts of sublime heroism.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope I will be permitted to submit the amendment which I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. SHANKS. I want the bill to stand just as it is. I ask this House and Congress to recognize the fact exactly that for an act of heroism this money is paid. I want it to appear that one white man and three Indians saved the lives of seventy Americans; and I want the heroism as three to one to stand in favor of that hated race of Indian people.

A MEMBER. Bring on your Indians. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. There is too much confusion in the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to say that I am in favor of the passage of the bill. I have no objection to vote for the bill as it now stands. But there are gentlemen that object to it who if it were amended by striking out the words "in recognition of," and inserting "in payment of expenses and losses incurred," would accept the bill and vote for it. I wish to have that amendment made.

Mr. SPEER. I rise to a point of order. I want to know by what rule or right the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] holds the floor for an hour in Committee of the Whole and undertakes to farm that out.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no limit in the rule as to the time the gentleman may occupy.

Mr. SPEER. Is there an hour rule in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to hold the floor for an hour, and that hour has not expired.

Mr. SPEER. I submit to the Chair that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] having made the motion that the bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House, he would be taken from the floor by a gentleman offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not observed that a gentleman making that motion has a perfect right to continue the debate. And the gentleman from Illinois has not yet been upon the floor an hour.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the motion now pending before the committee. Does the gentleman making it yield the floor?

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire of the Chair, is the bill amendable?

The CHAIRMAN. It unquestionably is, as soon as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] holding the floor yields it.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the moment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] moves that the bill be laid aside to be reported, he yields the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. He does, unquestionably, if he takes his seat, which he has not done. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the gentleman from Illinois, if he does not desire to speak further, shall yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] desire to speak further, or does he now yield the floor?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Can I not, without yielding the floor, get a division on the question whether the bill shall be laid aside, or not, to be reported?

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as the gentleman has finished his remarks then any other gentleman has the right to offer an amendment; and pending that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] proposes that the committee shall rise and make a report.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire, as a point of order, to call the attention of the Chair to a fact which I think has escaped him. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] said he declined to yield, and he said, "Now I hope there will be a vote on the motion." I submit that that is so yielding the floor that his colleague [Mr. BURCHARD] had a right to be recognized to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair observed that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] instead of taking his seat, continued to look at the Chair; and until the point was settled whether the gentleman yielded the floor or not, the Chair did not put that motion, and has not yet.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Can a gentleman hold the floor by simply standing up and looking at the Chair? [Laughter.] Must he not address the Chair if he wants to be recognized for his hour?

The CHAIRMAN. A gentleman holding the floor can do so as long as he is ready to proceed with his remarks. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. BLAINE, (the Speaker.) I do not rise to make any remarks on the pending bill. But I wish to state what may possibly aid the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar in its future deliberations, which will be much more frequent than they have been heretofore. The Private Calendar consists of numerous bills. The House of Representatives has been in the habit of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on a single bill as a special order. When the consideration of that bill is concluded, the gentleman having charge of it moves that the committee rise and report the bill. That motion cannot be put so long as a single member of the committee desires to offer an amendment. When the amendments have been disposed of, the committee rises, and the bill is submitted to the House.

Now it would be very inconvenient, if not impracticable, as the committee will see, with a long Calendar of bills, that the committee should rise and report each bill separately. And, therefore, the habit has grown up that when the committee takes action on any bill, that bill is laid aside to be reported when the committee rises. The motion to lay aside a bill in that way is not debatable; and whenever a gentleman makes the motion, a vote is at once had on it, unless some other gentleman desires to offer an amendment. But the gentleman making the motion as much yields the floor as a gentleman having an appropriation bill in charge does in moving that the committee rise and report the bill. And the bill cannot be laid aside as long as any gentleman desires to offer an amendment, any more than the Committee of the Whole can rise to report an appropriation bill, so long as any gentleman desires to make an amendment to it. When, therefore, a gentleman moves that a bill be laid aside, he by that motion relinquishes the floor; and then any other member of the Committee of the Whole has a right to move an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] one question.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Suppose that a motion is made that the committee rise for the purpose of reporting a bill to the House.

Mr. BLAINE. That is just the same motion precisely. The motion to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House is only for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of the Committee of the Whole rising with each bill, and then going back into committee again.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then there is no way in which a member who has charge of a bill can get it back into the House so long as there is any one who desires to offer an amendment to it?

Mr. BLAINE. That is the very spirit and purpose of the Committee of the Whole; that so long as any member of the committee desires to offer an amendment it cannot be reported to the House. That is what the Committee of the Whole is for, to get rid of the previous question, of the motion to lay on the table, to cut off every possible summary disposition of a bill, and leave it in the widest possible sense open to amendment, so long as any member desires to move an amendment to it. And everything that comes short of that destroys the purpose of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. Are there more than two undebatable motions in Committee of the Whole? The one being the motion that the committee rise and the other a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BLAINE. Those are the only two motions in Committee of the Whole that are not debatable. I am obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] for calling my attention to that point. The only two undebatable motions in Committee of the Whole are the motion that the committee rise and the motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill under consideration. That motion is made when the purpose is to bring the committee to a summary vote on any bill; and if the motion be carried, the committee must immediately rise and report their action to the House, for such action as the House may choose to take.

Mr. SPEER. Can any gentleman in Committee of the Whole obtain and hold the floor for an hour and farm it out to others?

Mr. BLAINE. The hour-rule is precisely the same in Committee of the Whole as in the House. As to farming out, that has grown up entirely from custom, and not from any rule. But the hour rule prevails in Committee of the Whole the same as in the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If such be the ruling of the Chair, then I desire to be heard a moment upon my motion to lay aside this bill to be reported to the House. The Chairman having ruled in my favor, I suppose will not now rule so as to take me from the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The only reason for continuing to recognize the gentleman as entitled to the floor was, that after making the motion to lay the bill aside he stood as if about to address the Chair further in support of that motion. If the gentleman now desires to proceed with his remarks in support of the motion, the Chair will be obliged to recognize him.

Mr. BECK. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. BECK. It is that gentlemen should be required to take their own seats, and to address the Chair and submit motions from their own seats, in order that they may be heard by other members.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The committee will please come to order. [After a brief pause:] The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I believe a large majority of this committee is in favor of this bill. I should be glad to secure for it the unanimous support of the House. I had supposed that under the rule I could yield the floor for the purpose of testing the sense of the Committee of the Whole on my motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House; and if that motion was voted down, then, of course, the bill would pass from my charge, and some gentleman in opposition to it would be recognized. If the committee sustained me in that motion, I supposed, of course, that the bill would be reported to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] will observe that that motion is debatable until voted upon.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I appeal to the committee not to amend this bill. I think it is now exactly what it ought to be—a recognition of the heroic act of this man. When this man has exhibited so much heroism, so much courage, so much humanity, so much nobleness, the House should not strike out that part of the bill which recognizes that act.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Would the gentleman from Illinois object to a simple transposition of the sentences in this bill, so that it would "appropriate $5,000 to Joseph J. Petri in payment of the expense and losses incurred by him in his heroic and successful efforts in rescuing from starvation and impending death a train of emigrants," &c.?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would not object to that.

Mr. BURCHARD. That is just the amendment which I proposed, and no other.

Mr. TYNER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TYNER. If I am not mistaken the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, [Mr. HAWLEY,] has submitted a motion to lay this bill aside to be reported to the House. Having done so, can he debate that motion himself after having submitted it?

The CHAIRMAN. Unquestionably it is a debatable question.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have not surrendered the floor, but if my colleague [Mr. BURCHARD] wishes to occupy it I will yield to him.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to a privileged motion.

Mr. BURCHARD. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] will state his privileged motion.

Mr. POTTER. It is to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] cannot, in order to make that motion, take the gentleman from Illinois off the floor.

Mr. BURCHARD. I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment which I wish to offer, and which I understand is acceptable to my colleague, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out in line 6 the words "recognition of," and inserting the words "payment of expenses and losses incurred by him in;" also by striking out, at the end of the bill, the words, "and in payment of the expenses and losses incurred by him in the same."

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask that the bill as it stands, with the amendment, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, to be paid to Joseph J. Petri, of the State of Illinois, in payment of expenses and losses incurred by him in his heroic and successful efforts in rescuing from starvation and impending death a train of emigrants snowed-in between the Sierra Nevada and Trinity Mountains, in the months of November and December, 1849.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I trust the bill will not be changed in that way.

Mr. SHANKS. I am opposed to that amendment. There is nothing in this case but heroism; and we do not want to strike that out of the bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have proposed my amendment for the purpose merely of obviating objections which have been made by other gentlemen to the bill. So far as my own vote is concerned, I do not care whether the amendment be adopted or not.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BURCHARD, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I now renew my motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. POTTER. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The motion of Mr. POTTER was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, it was agreed to.

So the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, having had the same under consideration, had directed him to report sundry bills with a favorable recommendation.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise for the purpose of moving that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next; but before submitting that motion I will ask unanimous consent that to-morrow be set apart for debate only.

Mr. RUSK. I object. I am in favor of economy, and I want to stop this printing of speeches.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 93, noes 55.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the yeas and nays. Let us finish the Private Calendar.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How can the gentleman finish the Private Calendar by calling the yeas and nays? [Laughter.]

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 26.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DAWES, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 145.

So (less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. HOLMAN, that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next, was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1168) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the removal of the Flathead and other Indians from the Bitter Root Valley, in the Territory of Montana," approved June 5, 1872; and

An act (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief William H. Vesey.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JOHN A. FISHER.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN BAKER.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1403) granting a pension to John Baker.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, there were—ayes 27, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. SMALL and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 46.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. SMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table two Senate bills, that they may be referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. MAYNARD. I feel obliged to object to anything except the disposition of bills upon the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is the regular order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object to any other business until the Private Calendar is disposed of.

Mr. POTTER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I again ask unanimous consent that a session be held to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. RUSK. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood that the gentleman had withdrawn his objection.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. POTTER that the House adjourn, it was not agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with the recommendation that they do pass, no objection being made, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 510) granting a pension to Thomas R. Hardwick;

A bill (H. R. No. 1404) for the relief of William F. Kerr;

A bill (H. R. No. 1405) for the relief of Victor Mylius;

A bill (H. R. No. 154) for the relief of William Stoddard, late assistant quartermaster United States Volunteers;

An act (S. No. 194) in relation to the monument erected to the memory of the Chevalier de Ternay;

A bill (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob Parmenter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1574) for the relief of Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont.

RICHARD H. SWIFT.

The SPEAKER. A bill (H. R. No. 1575) for the relief of Richard H. Swift is reported from the Committee of the Whole House with the recommendation that it do pass, and the question is on its engrossment and third reading.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I demand a division of the House on that bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 9.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with the recommendation that they do pass, no objection being made, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1576) for the relief of Reuel B. Fuller, of Wilton, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan L. Galloway; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1578) for the relief of Martin Kalbfleisch's Sons.

JOSEPH J. PETRI.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, with the recommendation that it do pass, was a bill (H. R. No. 1579) for the relief of Joseph J. Petri.

Mr. DONNAN. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. POTTER. I demand a division on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 8.

Mr. POTTER. I do not call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, because the rising vote demonstrates the fact that I could not accomplish anything if I did.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the several bills have been passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. HOLMAN. Some gentlemen desire to be heard to-morrow in debate, and I will again ask unanimous consent that to-morrow's session be for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. RUSK. I withdraw my objection upon the solicitation of a great number of gentlemen who desire to speak to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. There being no further objection, there will be a session for debate only to-morrow.

CONTESTED ELECTION, SECOND DISTRICT, ARKANSAS.

Mr. SPEER. I rise to move that the House adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Elections.

Mr. SPEER. I do not withdraw the motion to adjourn for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish simply to submit the report to have it printed.

Mr. SPEER. I do not yield for that purpose, because I understand there is a minority report which is not yet prepared.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. POTTER for five days; to Mr. ORTH indefinitely on account of the serious illness of a member of his family; and to Mr. ELLIOTT and to Mr. CAIN for a fortnight each.

Mr. SPEER. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The House will meet to-morrow as in Committee of the Whole, Mr. FORT, of Illinois, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore, for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

The House divided on Mr. SPEER's motion; and there were—ayes 68, noes 27.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five minutes to five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 7, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILLIE the reading of the Journal of yesterday was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. FORT in the chair.) The House meets to-day as in Committee of the Whole for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has the floor.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I yield to my colleague from Missouri, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.]

THE WEALTH AND WANTS OF THE WEST.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. At this day, Mr. Speaker, when the cry for bread is heard from two great sections of this Union, coming with equal urgency from the followers of each of the political parties, it is time that we, as the legislators for the whole country, had become awakened to that appeal. That cry is heard in piteous moan from the oppressed South, that ruined and broken vase around which the scent of the rose will forever cling, that land so beautifully described by one of her own gifted poets as—

The clime of the heart, the shrine of the sun; and it is also heard from the valleys and hill-tops of the vigorous West, whose unbroken strength will sooner or later break the cords with which she has been bound so long, and will by the inherent strength of her yet undeveloped power assert her own inalienable rights, and vindicate the wrongs of her associate in woe. Fealty to party is never strong when the wrongs of party entail suffering upon its followers, and in consequence of those wrongs inflicted by the dominant party upon the West and South are heard the murmurings of that "coming power" that will in its accelerated wave reach those slumbering and reveling in authority, and will scatter with furious hand those blind leaders of parties into—

The wide womb of uncertain night.

It is well enough for those of us in office to take a survey of the wants of the people, and to consider well how those wants can be supplied; to consider the evils surrounding them, by unjust legislation, by unholy combinations, and to consider how such legislation, how such combinations, can be repealed, can be overthrown. One thing is certain, that our statute-books are yet full of bad laws, the outgrowth of the war; the vicious legislation of an excited period, when under the rich drapery of declared loyalty, the East, with wonderful ability, secured the passage of such laws as "clothed her in purple and fine linen," at the severe expense of the West. The West, composed of such States as Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and Missouri—equally true to the Union of our fathers—sought not her own sectional interest during those terrible years, by unfair legislation, but went forth, like the disinherited knight, for the redemption of its hopes. And now, like the same glorious conqueror, it returns from the "feast of the swords, the shoutings of battle," to restore equal and exact justice to all. In the clamor of civil commotion those oppressive laws were enacted, and now, in the calm of almost a decade of years after peace has come, we demand the repeal of those laws.

We do not complain in the West that the labor of the husbandman is not repaid by excessive quantities of the cereals, by a superabundance of all kinds of agricultural productions. The people of the West grow poor because they have too much to eat. I propose to have them enriched by taking away a part of their excess.

This proposition may seem paradoxical to the thoughtless, however, but it is full of painful truth. This proposition applies not only to Missouri and those great producing States surrounding her, like stars in the coronet, but it applies with equal force to the great central basin of our continent, known as the Mississippi Valley.

Having asserted that our excesses in production were a burden to our farming classes, and failed to render such remuneration to that class as satisfies their demands, let us inquire into the characteristics of our part of that valley, and learn if it produces more than it consumes, and then ascertain if possible the best and simplest method by which to obviate the difficulties and lessen the growing evil.

The region known as the Mississippi Valley embraces in whole or in part twenty-four of the largest States and Territories of the American Republic, covering an area of more than a million square miles, and constituting the grandest industrial empire on the face of the globe.

Missouri forms one of the most important of the component parts of that rich valley. And before we enter into the general discussion of the other points let me, Mr. Speaker, speak somewhat of the superiorities of that wonderful State.

Until Texas and California overshadowed all the other States with their immense areas Missouri was the largest State in the Union. Prior to the war she occupied a prominent position in public estimation. The national halls of legislation were made attractive by the greatness and purity of Mr. Benton, the untarnished social and political life of Dr. Linn, the unexcelled logical powers of Henry M. Geyer, and that unsurpassed debater, James S. Green.

Saint Louis was then entering upon that wonderful career of commercial greatness which was predicted by Mr. Banks, of Massachusetts, when, with that acumen for which he is so noted, hearing the tread of coming millions, he said, upon the banks of the Mississippi River, upon the spot where he then stood, would grow the largest city upon our continent. The fiction of that day is rapidly becoming the truth of to-day. Her history in after years will be but that of past years—thrift, enterprise, and solidity. Nearly one-fourth of the population of Missouri is in her commercial metropolis. This city within the lives of some of her lingering citizens—her Shepperds, her Ranneys, and her Primms, men of cultivated brain and hearts—has grown from a little trading village into the fourth city in population, and third in manufactures in America. It is the natural center of trade of a vast and fruitful region, embracing an area of territory, larger than England, Ireland, Wales, Scotland, France, and Germany combined. With its twenty concentrated railroads, and more than twenty thousand miles of railway connections, with its fifteen thousand miles of navigable waters, offering tribute to this grand emporium, with its merchant princes and its firm banks, with its perfected school advantages and its hallowed church privileges, with its well-regulated police system, and its courts without stain, with its cultivated citizens, and, at last, with its great newspapers gladdening, with the dawn of day and the gathering of evening, the hearts of multiplied thousands, this city is, and will be, not only the pride of the Mississippi Valley, but must necessarily be the entrepôt between the Atlantic and Pacific sea-boards. As a Missourian, as an American citizen, with profound earnestness I say esto perpetua to Saint Louis.

Notwithstanding the terrible disasters of our civil war, that swept to and fro across our State like a tempest of fire, scorching and blasting whatever it touched, Missouri has rebounded from the ashes of her devastation, and in the face of all the obstructing evils and hinderances is rapidly advancing to the fulfillment of her destiny. What is that destiny to be? Let her geographical position, her embodied wealth, and material resources, her present capabilities and future possibilities, answer this question. It is bounded or penetrated by two of the largest rivers in America, and is watered by many other lesser streams that meander through every section and county of the State. It has nearly forty million acres of arable land, much of it as rich as the valley of the Nile. One-fourth of her surface is underlaid by coal-beds as exhaustless in quantity as it is excellent in quality. Four million acres cover beds of iron sufficient in quantity to supply the increasing wants of the world for ages to come, while her rich mines of zinc and lead ore are already offering up their treasures in great abundance to the skillful hand of the industrious toiler. There are, upon the borders and within the limits of that State, one thousand miles of navigable waters and three thousand miles of railway, thereby offering ample facilities to its wonderful tonnage. The present population of the State now exceeds two millions of brave, energetic people, whose crowning glory is the State of their adoption. The products of her farms for the year 1873 amounted to $160,000,000; her real and personal estate was valued at $550,000,000 for the same year; her manufactured products amounted to $250,000,000; her live-stock was valued at $100,000,000; and the product of her mines, yet scarcely opened, was valued at $10,000,000. Send us your hardy miners from the East and the North, with your millions of surplus money, to work and open up our mines in Missouri, and we will send you in return the unburied stores of our natural wealth. The crop of cereals in Missouri for the year 1873 exceeded 100,000,000 bushels. Of fibrous productions, Missouri exhibits 800,000 pounds of cotton, 160,000 pounds of flax, and 2,800 tons of hemp. Had her labor system been larger and more thoroughly organized, the fibrous production, especially that of hemp, would have been ten times its present exhibit. The growth of these articles is given merely to show that we have in that great State soil and climate adapted to every species of farm productions. We have in that State, Mr. Speaker, millions of acres for millions of hands, ready with but little labor for the eager touch of the coming husbandman, to which we invite all, Jew and Gentile, bond and free.

Having addressed myself for a short while to the virtues and excel-lences of my own State, I will now enter upon the broader field of my subject, which I hope will be more congenial to the views of my colleagues from the West. Before doing this I will say that I am not here to plead for the interests of the West and the South over those of the North and the East; I am possessed of views too broad, too national for that. I ask that all parts may be treated alike, giving to each "according to its bond and situation; nothing more, nothing less."

Passing beyond Missouri, let us glance for a moment at some of the leading features of that vast industrial empire termed "the West." It has an annual export of 7,500,000 tons of grain, besides its annual consumption of more than twice that quantity. Add to this 3,000,000 tons of meat, wool, cotton, hemp, tobacco, metals, and other western products, and you will have an annual export of more than 10,000,000 tons, a quantity almost beyond the conception of ordinary minds—sufficient to require the tonnage of 20,000 ships of 500 tons capacity. View it in another light, more striking than considering the exports in bulk. Each freight-car upon our railways is permitted to transport ten tons. At those rates it will require fifty cars to carry the burden of one ship, and to remove the tonnage of the 20,000 ships required to move the 10,000,000 tons of exportation will require 1,000,000 cars. Where are all of the cars to be gotten? I have already stated that it will require 1,000,000 cars to remove this excess from the West. Now suppose each car to be 20 feet long; 1,000,000 will occupy 20,000,000 feet, a distance 400 miles greater than it is from San Francisco to the city of New York.

My old classmate and friend, the brilliant young member from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN,] has just handed me, Mr. Speaker, the following resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, that entirely corroborate what I have already said:

That the cereal products of the interior States north of the Ohio River, embracing the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, were, in the year 1840, 166,304,201 bushels; in 1850, 311,581,066 bushels; in 1860, 577,255,715 bushels; and in 1870, 812,055,564 bushels.

Estimating these cereals at 60 pounds avoirdupois per bushel for wheat, 56 for Indian corn, and 32 for oats, with the customary rates for the minor grains, (rye, buckwheat, and barley,) the total weight of the 812,058,364 bushels was 42,302,282,904 pounds, or, in round numbers, 21,000,000 tons of 2,000 pounds, slightly exceeding 40 bushels to a ton. If 11,000,000 tons were reserved (which is an extravagant allowance) to feed the population and animals of the interior States, there would remain for other purposes 10,000,000 tons, nearly all of which, with adequate channels, furnishing cheap and rapid transportation, would be exported to other States or sent down to the sea-board for export to foreign countries to feed their constantly increasing population and animals. The 10,000,000 tons, if ground into flour or meal, and placed in barrels holding 5 bushels, would require 80,000,000 barrels, and would fill 40,000 Erie Canal boats, each carrying 250 tons, or 1,000,000 railway freight-cars, each carrying 10 tons. In addition to this, a considerable portion of the 11,000,000 tons, reserved to feed the population and animals of the interior, would reappear, diminished in weight, but much increased in relative value, in beef, pork, dairy products, and other animal food, greatly needed on both sides of the Atlantic, and serving to swell the rich centrifugal streams of our inland commerce.

What is to become of this immense excess, this dead capital upon the hands of the people of the West? It is a serious question with them.

Sir, the West and its exports may be fitly represented by the Siamese twins. If the one prospers and is healthy, so does the other. If the one suffers, so does the other. The same shaft of death that strikes one down so shocks the physical system of the other that it soon obeys the same final summons. United they stand, divided they fall. That excess is not needed for home consumption, for that is supplied by the fifteen million tons not considered as exports.

What cheap and available facilities, I ask, are possessed by the West for the removal to the markets of the world of her vast export productions? I say comparatively none. That is the main cause, in my estimation, of the settled gloom overhanging like a pall of death the agricultural interests of the West. As one of the humble Representatives of that great people, I appeal to my brother members in Congress to assist us, by kind legislation, in removing that cause; give us but a fractional part of what you have given to railroads, to those grandest of all evils; to that "sum of all villainies," tariff monopolies, and we will be satisfied.

> Dispel the cloud; the light of heaven restore;
> Give us to see, and Ajax asks no more.

Our railways are unable to transport our surplus to the markets of the East, and if they could it would be at such a heavy cost to our farmers that it would be economy to give them the lion's share to remove the other part to some point of consumption. Only one million tons of the exportable products can, by all the facilities within our command, be shipped to desirable markets; and that at the absorption of one-half of that million for transportation, the other nine million tons remaining upon our hands, dead and unprofitable capital, stagnating our markets and bankrupting the producers.

Although the railways have been the source of many of our woes, yet they have some virtues that should not be overlooked. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" are words embodying the very essence of the golden rule. The railroads, being unable to remove the whole, remove only a part, and at such prices as oppress the producers. If those same railroads would remove that one million tons free, the loss upon the nine million tons, which they have not the capacity to remove, would greatly counterbalance the gain upon that million tons in market.

Their incapacity should not produce rash legislation upon our part. I do not exonerate railroad companies from great censure. At a proper time I shall deal with their evils. In this argument I desire to point out a way superior to all railways for cheap transportation, "and not subject to be changed at the caprice or greed of a few managers of existing lines of railroads."

Railways are not at this day, nor will they ever be, able, at our ratio of increase in population and production, to solve the problem of cheap transportation. They are but one of the factors in the great problem, important in its place, yet totally incapable alone of answering to the wants of the people.

I will here state, Mr. Speaker, that the "enormous increase in population and in the productions of agriculture, mining, and manufacture," in the States of the West and Northwest has so far surpassed the increase of the means of transportation that the present stagnation will overhang for years to come unless some means be devised to accelerate the advancement of the means of transportation. In proof of this I refer you to the following data, compiled from the censuses of 1850, 1860, and 1870 by an engineer of great accomplishments, I mean Eugene S. Hardy, of Georgia:

NORTHWESTERN STATES, OR THOSE OF THE FIRST GROUP.

Or 1,465 per cent. over 1850, and 177 per cent. over 1860.

With such an exhibit of the rapid growth of wealth in said States, it is very natural to hear the cries for transportation, for more facilities of transportation, for cheap transportation, and the like. In fact, the prosperity of a country depends upon it, and this is so true, that every government in Europe has a special administration of public works and civil engineers, whose duties are specially to see if the means for transportation are adequate to the productions and necessities of the country.

In the actual case the inquiry is, have the means of transportation been made adequate in the last two decades for the fast-growing productions of the States above named. It must be borne in mind that these same States have to depend upon two kinds of transportation: the inner or home transportation, and the outer or that of the surplus productions to markets. The ninth census, or that of 1870, is entirely unavailable for information in that direction. It ignores completely the most vital and important question of transportation—railways, canals, or all other land or water means of communication—upon which are dependent the lives of the agriculture, industry, and commerce of the country, and the value of which represents by itself a good portion of the national wealth. Witness the railways, which, according to the eighth census, represented in 1860 a capital of $1,166,422,729; and in 1870, according to the American Railroad Journal, their value of cost was estimated at $2,212,412,719.

From this source I find that the progression of railways in the same States has been thus:

Fourteenth. Railroads:	Miles.
1850	150.00
1860	5,287.71
1870	12,368.80

Or an increase of 133 per cent. upon 1860; an increase not in proportion and hardly in keeping with that of the various productions and sources of wealth in the last decade.

It must be borne in mind that, if these railways and other channels are sufficient for home transportation and accommodation, they are useless to carry to market the immense excess or surplus which must find its way to the Gulf of Mexico and to the Atlantic sea-board for home consumption, as well as for export to Europe, the West Indies, and South America.

As to the first direction, the great Mississippi River offers unlimited facilities of transportation, available at all seasons of the year; and as to the quantities, the only limits being the demands of its markets. The other routes are limited, circuitous, and very costly to pass the produce over to the south Atlantic or cotton States, which are the best markets for western producers.

From this table you will perceive at once that the present railway means of transportation are not commensurate to the demands of our people. Nothing but our inland seas, of which the Mississippi River is the greatest and most valuable, and the great ocean, can take our surplus products to the markets of the world.

There is a disposition among some of the members of Congress to engage the Government in the "construction of a double-track freight railway from New York to Council Bluffs, with branches to Saint Louis and Chicago." This gigantic scheme will cost, according to the estimates of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] the sum of $175,000,000. It is safe to say that if the estimates place the cost at that enormous sum of money as the least that will build it, it will take double that sum to construct such a road in the hands of the Government. It is a dangerous project, not at all free from constitutional objections, and with great tendencies to centralization of all delegated and undelegated powers in Congress. I think it should be avoided. So says Grand Master Adams, in a speech delivered in Saint Louis before the National Grange, on the 4th of February. Here is what he says:

Where lies the difficulty? For even in our own ranks there is a battle of opinion. Some advocate new routes East, subsidized by Government, either rail or canal. Others would have new roads made by private enterprise, and trust to competition. The first of these would require many years before they could afford the relief which we want now, and besides would surely develop into other Credit Mobiliers. The second would only add one more link to the chain which now binds us hand and foot.

The West does not ask the construction of such a railroad. If built, it would not accommodate its wants—only add to the burdens of taxation now resting so heavily upon it. I may be asked, what does she want?

I answer, a just and economical expenditure of such a sum of money as will be necessary to open the Mississippi River from its highest navigable point to the Gulf of Mexico, so that the waters of that majestic stream may flow "unvexed to the sea."

I again answer, a just and economical expenditure of that sum of money that will be required to make the Ohio River navigable at all seasons of the year from Pittsburgh to Cairo; and I ask for such a sum of money as will be necessary when judiciously expended to render navigable theMissouri River from its highest navigable point to its mouth.

And I again say, Mr. Speaker, a just and economical expenditure of such a sum of money as will be necessary to open the mouths of the Mississippi River permanently and fully, so that all vessels may pass in and out from the city of New Orleans without the assistance of that greatest of all commercial curses, the Tow-Boat Association.

I again say, Mr. Speaker, in consideration of the fact that the West and South have for so many long years filled the coffers of the Government by the coined sweat of their own hardy sons, that it proceed at once to open those national highways which cannot and will not cost over $15,000,000, and soon that insignificant sum will be returned to the Government with a usury greater than that ever "nominated in a bond," by a happy and prosperous people.

Solomon, that wisest of all legislators, said, "He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him, but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it." Shall the West and South be favored with this loan? They ask it not as a gift, as the increase of their industry will return every dollar of it into the Treasury of the Government, "before the shoes shall have grown old" upon the feet of the engineer under whom the work is done.

Why, sir, New York, Massachusetts, and Michigan have obtained from the Government for their river and harbor improvements as much money as twenty-four States and Territories ask to be expended in the improvement of the three great rivers of the West. Look at the area of that magnificent section of our country, with its teeming millions, its diversified interests, its present value, and its future hopes, and tell me whether their request is an unnatural one; whether, in the great national compact of joint and equal partnership of all the States in the glories and profits of the whole under one federal head, our communis mater, the West and South should not have this comparatively small sum, sought for purposes so immense. In that partnership they have only been contributors to the general fund, not beneficiaries upon it, while other sections have been constantly aggrandized by it.

It is not demanded for the purpose of building cottages by the sea; for the purpose of purchasing elegant carriages for the use of perfumed officials, ornamented by liveried servants and armorial devices; not for the purposes of fitting out fleets at great cost to bear some young scion of the American aristocracy to foreign courts; nor do we ask it to erect splendid palaces upon the boulevards of Washington City for senatorial residences. But we do ask it, Mr. Speaker, with a united voice from those sections of our common country, for and in behalf of our toiling millions whose heads have been made bald, whose shoulders have been peeled, by the burning sun as they planted, cultivated, and gathered in their unprofitable crops.

Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to direct your attention to the stubborn facts presented by the following tables, as published by a newspaper in New Orleans:

STATEMENT OF GRAIN RAISED IN CERTAIN STATES TRIBUTARY TO THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER IN 1873.

	Bushels.
Minnesota	44,310,000
Iowa	152,438,000
Missouri	122,214,000
Kansas	29,645,000
Illinois	248,668,000
Indiana	249,688,000
Tennessee	54,247,000
Kentucky	79,745,000
Arkansas	17,211,000
Mississippi	20,427,000
Texas	27,252,000
Louisiana	8,530,000
Nebraska	10,710,000
Nevada	734,000
Fourteen States—total	1,066,819,000

STATEMENT OF GRAIN RAISED IN TERRITORIES TRIBUTARY TO THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER IN 1873.

	Bushels.
Dakota	526,000
Idaho	318,000
New Mexico	1,338,000
Montana	517,000
Arizona	142,000
Total of bushels	2,841,000
Add for fourteen States above	1,066,819,000
Grand total	1,069,660,000

It will be observed that these figures represent only bushels of grain. No account is taken of other productions of this wonderful valley. These yet remain to be added to the computation:

Hay, tons	25,000,000
Potatoes, bushels	40,000,000
Tobacco, hogsheads	300,000
Cotton, bales	2,403,000
Animal food—surplus beef, cattle, and hogs, head	5,135,600

And still we have made no computation of the crops of hemp, sugar, rice, or of fruits and vegetables, nor yet of mining products, such as lead, iron, copper, coal, and salt, all of which, with innumerable other articles, are to be added to the grand totals given above, and altogether constituting a basis of commerce and exchange almost incomprehensible.

It aggregates in grain alone 1,069,660,000 bushels. Say that nine-tenths of this quantity are consumed at home and in our own markets in the United States, that is 962,694,000 bushels, leaving 106,966,000 bushels of surplus grain for foreign exportation. I omit Ohio and Wisconsin from the list of States, as from their positions they more naturally seek the eastern outlets.

It is evidently the case that those States and Territories given in the above list do not consume the 962,694,000 bushels of grain. Giving those States and Territories a population of 15,000,000, and placing the per capita consumption of that grain at fifty bushels, there are consumed only 750,000,000 bushels, leaving a balance of 212,694,000 bushels for home exportation.

The average distance of those States and Territories from the ruling market of our country, New York, is about 1,500 miles, with a cost of fifteen mills per ton per mile for railroad transportations if that were possible. The value of wheat is absorbed in going 3,300 miles; and corn, in a distance of 1,650 miles. In view of this statement, how much profit would remain to farmers after handling and transporting the 212,694,000 bushels of grain to New York? Not the home value of one-third of that quantity of bushels. It had all better be burned for fuel and save the timber of the country. "No wonder," says another, "that the West is awakened to the consciousness that it has reached the limit of profitable production. No wonder that the cry has gone up from the West for a way to the sea which shall be unfailing and adequate to its wants."

I think I have demonstrated the fact that the 212,000,000 bushels of surplus grain realized comparatively nothing to its producers. Now let us see what gain will be realized from the 106,966,000 bushels of grain set aside for foreign markets, provided the Mississippi River is so opened that it will have a clear exit to the ocean.

In ascertaining what the 106,966,000 bushels of grain bring in return to the producers, we must consider how much cheaper the river outlet is than those of railways, lakes, and canals. It is also important to know in arriving at a correct comparison between the southern and eastern outlets that the southern outlet is open to navigation winter and summer, which is not the case with the eastern outlet if the lakes and canals are used. Hence, upon the one route the charges for transportation are about the same the year round, when upon the others they vary with the seasons. The lake and canal routes are generally locked in the embrace of northern winters at the time our western crops are ready for the markets. Nature has placed in one great valley a stream of water unsurpassed in volume and capacity, and ready at all seasons to bear away our wealth upon its placid bosom to that beautiful city at its exit, which sits like a glorious empress amidst her bowers of flowers and magnolias, "at once the patron of agriculture, the home of commerce."

Here are the facts demonstrated by figures from the same source—so plainly that a wayfaring man, though a fool, shall not err therein:

COST OF GRAIN TRANSPORTATION FROM CHICAGO TO LIVERPOOL, VIA NEW YORK.

Summer route, lake and canal.

	Cents.
Cost of corn	35
To New York	25
New York charges	4
Ocean freights	18
Total	82

Winter route, by rail.

	Cents.
Cost of corn	35
To New York	39
New York charges	4
Ocean charges	18
Total	96

COST OF GRAIN TRANSPORTATION FROM SAINT LOUIS TO LIVERPOOL, VIA NEW ORLEANS.

	Cents.
Cost of corn in Saint Louis	35
River freight	10
New Orleans charges	2
Ocean charges, 12*d.*, or	24
	71

Hon. Henry T. Blow, of Missouri, at the Saint Louis convention of Congressmen to consider the wants of the West, submitted the following table, showing the cost of transportation of grain by the various routes in use:

	Mills.
By rail, per ton per mile	13
By canal, per ton per mile	7
By lake, per ton per mile	5½
By river, per ton per mile	3½
By ocean, per ton per mile	1¼

"Thus," adds Mr. Blow, "does it appear that the cost of river transportation is more than 100 per cent. cheaper than canal transportation, and within a fraction of 500 per cent. cheaper than railway transportation. Does not this important fact," he further adds, "suggest a solution of the great question now under discussion?"

But what is the West to gain by adopting the New Orleans route to the sea? How and how much will it benefit the farmer? We have already seen that the exportable grain surplus is 106,966,000 bushels. The averege difference the year round, between the two routes on grain delivered at Liverpool is 18 cents per bushel. In summer the difference is 11 cents and in winter 25 cents in favor of New Orleans, making an average of 18 cents the year round. To avoid all possible overestimates, we will say the difference is 14 cents the year round, and see what a stupendous result is obtained. Let every farmer and every land-owner in the West read the figures and make the calculation for himself. It would save to the producers every year, as already stated, $14,995,000 on the yield of their lands; it would add every year to the value of each one hundred acres of corn, at seventy bushels to the acre, $980. That is, instead of 20 cents they now get for their corn, they would receive 34 cents per bushel.

But this is not all. With such results agricultural production would take a new start, and all the lands of the West must instantly appreciate from 25 to 50 per cent., according to their proximity to river routes of transportation.

According to the report submitted to the Windom committee by the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, there were shipped to the eastern sea-boards during the year 1873, "wheat and flour to the amount of 140,000,000 bushels," at an excess of freight of 20 cents per bushel; making on those articles alone a loss of $28,000,000, equally to be sustained between the consumer and producer, as stated by the Saint Louis Republican. Are not these losses, coming annually, too great to be borne with patience by the farming interest of the West? They are greater, sir, than the cost of running this whole Government for any one year of the administrations of Washington, John Adams, or Jefferson; and if longer submitted to will place every farm in the West under a mortgage or in the hands of the capitalists of the country. Here, sir, is a severely practical illustration of what is meant by the expression "the rich are becoming richer and the poor poorer."

Whenever the wealth of this country is consolidated in the hands of its capitalists, at the expense of the great masses of the people, then our country, our boasted land of liberty, will be but another instance of the many "gathered into the golden urn of history"—where liberty, country, and hopes were lost by such an accumulating vice, by such a greed after gain.

But cheap transportation, though good in itself and much desired, is not the grand specific, the do-all and cure-all for the ills under which the West is suffering. It is a great desideratum of our people; still it does not reach and destroy the root of the disease. The West and South, according to my views, suffer under four great evils, four great monopolies, borne nowhere upon this earth by a free and enlightened people save in our own land—I mean a discounted currency, blocked rivers, national banks, and the tariff. The four combined legalized robberies strike deep at the prosperity of this country, especially at that part of the country engaged chiefly in agricultural pursuits. Any one of these evils is sufficient to bring sorrow to a country; the four acting in conjunction are enough to make any country cry out, in the language of the blighted, accursed Cain, "My punishment is greater than I can bear." The people may wonder what is the matter with the country; why is it that it is all labor and no profit; why is it that our taxes are so great; why that our comforts are so few. I say to them that "the end is not yet," and will not be until these four great beasts are slain.

The West has suffered greatly from the want of diversified industry. We produce everything and make nothing, that is, compared to our natural capacities. We have plenty of idle hands, a great excess of food, and an abundance of the crude, raw material. A pure labor monopoly is a financial failure, a moral curse to the body-politic. The most prosperous community is that where diversified pursuits give profitable employment to all; where there are few drones in the human hive, and every hand, as far as possible, feeds its own mouth.

Look at that handsome gallery surrounding us, Mr. Speaker. It is daily crowded with the same idle hands and curious faces, more ready to applaud the loud cry of the demagogue for "beauty and booty" than to seek an honest living by the sweat of the brow. Let the idle creatures go forth to work, as idleness is the parent of vice; and from their appearance I am inclined to the belief that their bodies need a greater purification than their minds do of political knowledge.

With this diversified occupation in the West we will be better prepared to meet financial panics. It will produce an independence in our great section equal to its own magnificence.

New England teaches us a wholesome lesson in this respect. While manufactures constitute her great leading interests, she has many other diversified, profitable industries. She gathers treasures from the ocean; her Yankee sons "take the wings of the morning" and gather in the "dew-drops" of heaven; they fly to the uttermost parts of the earth for an idea; they will almost descend into hell with their enterprising spirit to learn with what patent of arms the apostate angel, with spirits damned

> Raised impious war in heaven, and battled proud
> With vain attempt.

And they make their cold and barren hills to "bloom and blossom as the rose," to yield a returning crop to their skillful touch. Nowhere does the whole population devote itself to a single pursuit. If one of her villages is given to the cultivation or production of one vegetable, one article of industry, the adjoining village will engage in different productions. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise." The West with all of its natural graces, its bold and generous men, its yet unbound enterprises, requires just such a division of labor as will enable it to transform its raw materials into shapes suited to the wants of modern civilization. With such a policy we would keep a large portion of our money at home, and create a large home demand for our farm products. "If the mountain will not go to Mahomet, Mahomet must come to the mountain."

I may be asked how these industries are to be diversified. By inviting capital into our midst. Nature has done her part; let man do his. If we cannot transport our inexhaustible stores of food to the hungry millions of the East and of Europe, let those hungry millions, that know how to work in skilled and unskilled labor, come with their families to consume our meat and bread, our corn and our fruits, and work in our mines, workshops, and factories. Is there wisdom or economy in sending a thousand bushels of wheat to purchase a machine in Boston when half the cost will be expended in double transportation, and the same machine could be made just as well in Saint Louis, Boonville, Jefferson City, Sedalia, or Warrensburgh?

I think the demand of the grangers in Missouri for home manufactures a wise one. Every implement used by our farmers should be manufactured in our own State. Why not? We have the timber, the iron, the water, and the territory. The West, in order to secure financial independence and permanent prosperity, must have her own manufacturing establishments. We must no longer perpetuate the blind folly of sending twenty cents' worth of iron ore to Pittsburgh to be returned to us in a stove worth twenty dollars.

Saint Louis, I rejoice in saying, has set a noble example in the encouragement of mechanical industries, and is rapidly growing great, rich, and powerful from this cause. Her beautiful name is the household word of all we meet in the East. She sits a glorious queen upon the banks of the great Mississippi, with the gentle Ceres as her handmaiden and the dusky Vulcan as her messenger. The same spirit of home work and home independence should be extended to every town, every village, throughout the West.

But where is the money to set all these furnaces, foundries, steam-hammers, spindles, and looms at work? Seventy millions of it is just where it ought not to be, locked up in the banks of New England, without the sanction of the law and in express violation of the rights of the West. The West lacks that much in the distribution of the national-bank capital. The East in this, as in all other things under the control of the Government, by having all the departments under their special control, has obtained as much more in excess of their rights as they are deficient in the area of territory and in the bulk of population. The West, with her gathering population of eager humanity, with her increasing industries, with her present greatness and her promising future, asks and demands as a right the readjustment of the national finances, by which she may have sufficient money to develop her hidden wealth, to move her products "from her sight and to manufacture her raw material" into the necessities of a cultivated people.

In order that the partiality of the distribution of the money may be more fully seen, I will enter into the subject with a little more particularity. The six New England States have received, in round numbers, $70,000,000 more than their population and wealth entitle them to. The four Middle States have an excess of $9,000,000. The nine Western States have not received their quota by $21,000,000. The South shows a deficiency of $51,000,000; and the Pacific States fall below their just proportion in the sum of $8,000,000. Again, I will show the inequality in a more distinctive and personal form. In the New England States the per capita distribution amounts to $32—running up to $62 in Rhode Island, and $41 in Massachusetts. "Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass; or loweth the ox over his fodder?" In the Middle States the per capita is $13; in the Western States $8 per head; and in the Southern States $2 per head. How do my republican friends from the West upon the other side of this Hall like this picture, drawn from their own statistics, under their own management? Their constituents are answering the question in their councils and in their resolutions; and I warn them to give ear unto the sound.

This state of things fully explains the severe equanimity and pious resignation with which our New England brethren bear the evils of the present financial revulsion in the West. We of the West are a part and parcel of this national household, although in your estimation minima pars we may be, and if by this unjust system of legislation we are still dragged at your wheels, the time will soon come when you will feel the day of our reckoning. We will wear with pride the emblems of our national unity, bear with you, the same streaming banner upon every future field of battle, and worship with you under the same "vine and fig-tree;" share with you with knightly courtesy, if you will come among us, our homes and our hospitalities. Yet I say to you now that the time is fast approaching when we will know the mastery in population, when we will fill these Halls with a western and southern majority, when we will assume a commercial and manufacturing independence worthy of our situation, and having so long felt the grinding of your iron into our very souls, we will then teach you that lesson of charity by example never expressed toward us by you in actions.

The East is to-day clamoring for resumption of specie payment, when the West is clamoring for the currency of the country. Immediate resumption means to them many millions of profits; means to us in the West many millions of losses. Our State, county, city, and corporation bonds crowd their bank-vaults, and to compel their payment with all accruing interests in gold and silver would as inevitably prostrate the West under the heel of those national tax-gatherers, the marshals of the Federal courts, as the South has been under the vicious touch and misrule of carpet-bag governments.

It took England twenty-seven years to resume specie payment after her war with the first Napoleon. Her commerce, her population, her internal affairs were not more disarranged than ours after the late rebellion. After the fall of Napoleon her people were one people, united from one end of her territory to the other. Not so with ours. Our battle-fields covered almost all the Southern and many of the Western States. The scars of "shot and shell" are still fresh with us; yet the cry is heard from those States which never stood upon the "perilous edge of battle," which never had the tread of a soldier in their midst, only those preparing to leave for other fields, which never trembled under the rumbling wheels of thundering cannon, "Give us gold and silver; away with the base currency we once gave you."

Why, sir, "one might consider them to be the lineal descendants and heirs at law of those Jews who garnished the sepulchers of the prophets and crucified the Fulfiller of their predictions." During the war and the following years this Government has been managed by one-tenth of the people and less than one-fifth part of the territory. During that time Congress has but confirmed the edicts of New England committee-men.

When this partiality and injustice is practiced toward the South we can understand it, though we reprobate the spirit that prompts it. But the patriotism of the West is without a blemish, and she should not be compelled to undergo the gentle penance of reconstruction. Illinois stood upon the same battle-fields with Massachusetts, and the brave soldiers of Indiana returned from the scenes of blood with as many trophies of victory as did those of Maine. The strong arms and brave hearts of the people of the West have subdued a vast wilderness and conquered from Nature an area of territory larger than the original thirteen States. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] and the one from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] "bronzed by the livery of the burning sun," will bear witness to the fact that "the energy of the hardy sons of the West molded their Territories into magnificent States."

Our soldiers have always been first in the fight and last to retire. Their sabers flashed in the morning sun like a wall of fire upon every battle-field, from that of Manassas' bloody day to the last one that crowned "Sherman's march to the sea." The hour of victory to them was the hour of mercy. Would to God that that same mercy had possessed the legislators in this Hall!

But it is no suspicion of our loyalty that leads to this national injustice. You may impute great crimes to the South, yet she is now of us and with us, covered all over with as honorable scars as were ever worn by any of the "old guard," and it is your duty to receive her as the brave victor always does the vanquished. "Her sins may have been many and deep, and of the color of scarlet, yet they will become as white as wool" in comparison with those that have been committed against her in the hour of her helplessness and distress. It is simply the lust of power and the greed of gold that have made us so long the hewers of wood and the drawers of water to the Eastern States. I freely admit that you of the East have the money and the brains, and that unity, begotten of a common interest, to seek the hour when you should contend with safety against the divided counsels of the whole Mississippi Valley, and it is not strange that you have hitherto maintained political ascendency.

Sir, that hour is rapidly passing away. "Saul is amongst the prophets," and sooner than you anticipate he will occupy the throne of the kingdom. The center of population of this country is now within a hundred miles of Saint Louis, and stranger things have happened in the world's history than the removal of these huge piles of marble and granite, these mighty domes and cloud-capped palaces, from the East to the West.

But we need not wait for the center of population to reach the Mississippi before we can secure our rights. The West, as well as the East, is now a unit. If the selfish and greedy politician will hold his ear awake, he will hear a new and strange song that comes to us on every western breeze. It is not the angry shout of an embattled host, but a loud chorus of a great multitude of honest, hard-working people, who are again catching the spirit of freedom, and are asserting the independence of individual political action, as superior to the behests of party and the tyranny of caucus. It is the song of the grangers, and the mighty refrain gathers volume and power from every hamlet and house in the great West. How it sweeps along with the wild winds of the prairies, catching new voices from every field and forest, gliding along the streams, echoing from bank to bank, and leaping from hill-top to hill-top, ever swelling the grand anthem of industrial freedom and liberty, over all that vast empire. Its voice will be heard by all and felt by many. This is the power that stands at the doors of this Capitol and asks, not in the tone of menace, but entreaty, for simple justice. Is it proper to refuse the prayer? I say no, no, no.

As mattersnow stand, the people of the West have scarcely money enough to pay their taxes. They should have more. When we consider the immense area of territory opened since the war, our greatly increased population, and that four million negroes have become users of money—even though it be but ten dollars per head—I am constrained to say that more money should be put in circulation. It is better, in my estimation, to have a contented and happy people all over the country than a few happy capitalists and bondholders in the East. Money enough to meet the exigencies of the people will produce that happiness; while, upon the other hand, to contract is but to tighten the screw already agonizing the people and grinding them to the earth. Contraction will degrade American labor to the low condition of European dependence and serfdom.

From such elements of ignorance and degradation spring the bitter fruits of social communism and radical agrarianism. This great problem of labor and capital cannot be settled by the sneer of the rich man or the club of the policeman. Work is abundant and profitable when money is plentiful. Work and wages, otherwise stated labor and profitable results, bring contentment and a law-abiding people. Panics and financial distresses produce idleness, with her lawless train of robberies, riots, and revolutions. The American laborer is generally intelligent and patient, with but few wild Utopian notions, and no sympathy with the baneful doctrines of communism; but if he is treated with persistent injustice and reckless disregard, and the fruits of his toil are turned to ashes by unwise legislation, he can become the most dangerous of all citizens.

This dangerous element of communism in our system can only be eliminated by just and liberal legislation that shall elevate and not degrade the workingman.

One theory more respecting the interests of the West—in fact, intimately blended with the prosperity of the whole country—and I will retire from this floor. We are willing to bear our part of the burdens of Government, but we are not willing to give the fruit of our farms and the toil of our hands to enrich others under the disguise of protecting American manufactures against foreign "pauper labor."

If we must have a tariff for revenue exclusively, let it be; and let it strike at the costly luxuries of the rich instead of the cheaper comforts of the poor. Let capital do its full share in sustaining the Government which protects it as no poor man's home is, and give the toiling man free access to the best and cheapest markets of the world. Our manufactures can be profitably carried on without further protection than that incidental to the handling and transporting the foreign-competing goods.

The great majority of the masses or people of all governments are poor—men and women of small means—and that government exhibits the greatest amount of wisdom that keeps its laboring classes prosperous by constant work; that makes straight their paths; that makes light their burdens; and that says to them, through judicious legislation, in the language of divine inspiration, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Our people, Mr. Speaker, need such a "rest." Those long, terrible years of carnage brought no more sorrow to their hearts than these passing years of taxation are now doing. The political party that gives that rest, that freedom to the people so much desired, will be the one to govern this country. I think the republican party has failed in the attempt.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in the remarks I have to submit I hope I will not be considered as an enemy to the great railroad system of our country. It is a monument to the enterprise and intellectual advancement of our people, for which every American must feel a manly pride. Countries remote from civilization have been placed in communication with the outside world; and many blessings have been conferred upon the people of the West by this pioneer of civilization; and in the future it must be one of the most important agencies in developing and building up the interior commerce of our country.

But the defects in their management are so oppressive as to need some strong regulating power. Their original purpose of benefit to the people is very often defeated, and so warped as to become a grasping, soulless, money-making machine, in the hands of crafty and avaricious men. Some of these men have made fabulous fortunes in the last few years, and the belief, whether true or not, is firmly fixed in the minds of the people that they have been made the victims of daring and unscrupulous swindlers; and hence there is a fierce feeling of antagonism growing up in all agricultural districts, demanding that the national Legislature step between them and these extortionists, and compel them by law to carry the produce of the farm at less exorbitant rates.

Now, I am aware that this is a very grave question, surrounded by so many difficulties of expediency and perhaps constitutionality, that it is feared no conclusion will be arrived at acceptable to all parts of the country, and not be an improper assumption over the carriers of our interior commerce. In my judgment there is a way to acccommodate all the embarrassments of the subject, meeting all the requirements of cheap transportation, and at the same time not rudely trenching upon the legal or equitable rights of railroads to the Atlantic seaboard.

It is an old truism that "competition is the life of trade;" and it is in its application that we seek the solution of all difficulties surrounding this subject. Give to the country competing lines in sufficient number and capacity to carry easily and economically all the produce of the country, and we shall no longer hear of exorbitant freights.

It is a fact in regard to transportation, as in the every-day business of life, let a number of competitors enter the field to do the same thing, their ambition and interest to succeed bring them down to the lowest possible standard. The reason why all freights advance on eastern through lines, when the winter comes on, is for the want of that competition that is furnished during the summer months by lake and canal navigation. This hardship the farmers pass through every season; and that it is a great one only reflect that the farmer cannot get his entire crop ready for shipment before the winter sets in. The corn crop is of this character, the increased winter freights amounting to complete prohibition. If he moves it at all it must lie over until navigation again opens or be entirely lost, which is very often the case. For this reason alone millions of bushels of corn are left to rot or be wastefully consumed.

There can be but one reason for this sad condition of affairs. The daily quotations of the price of corn in the eastern market show that a handsome profit could be realized to the farmer on this product if he only had some cheap way of getting to market. This high and unnecessary charge for transportation being one of the difficulties that stand in the way of the farmer's prosperity, is it not a duty we owe to this important class of citizens to devise if possible a new route of transportation, that will not be subject to the great fluctuations of the present system, and that will insure such competition all the year round that the farmer may plant his crop with the certainty that when matured he will find an easy, safe, and economical route to the place of consumption, whether that be in our own or foreign countries?

We assume, therefore, that it is a patriotic necessity for the national Government to exercise its power to protect the most important of all pursuits from demoralization and decay; not by a protective tariff, as has been done in respect to our eastern manufactures, but simply to see that this interest, the people engaged in this pursuit, are not robbed and plundered of their hard earnings by legalized monopolies that, like vampires, are sucking the very life-blood out of the West.

It is presumed that no intelligent member of this House will controvert the fact that the agricultural interests are terribly imposed upon, crushed down with burdens such as are felt by no other class in this country; and such being the case, we cannot longer put off some wise and prudent legislation on this question. Let us inquire, then, how this can be brought about for the greatest good to our whole country.

It has been suggested that we build double-track railways from the producing region to the sea-board. We have nothing to urge as a special reason against this plan, except the cost, and hope it may be, at some future day, carried into effect. We are, however, impressed with the belief, assuming that such a railroad would cost $75,000 per mile, that private capital could not be found to invest in an enterprise with the prospect of a very low interest on the money invested. If built by the Government, the running expenses being much higher than with roads run by private corporations, the interest on the construction bonds could not be met by the earnings of the road. This would make a large addition to our national debt, which all parties wish to avoid.

If we can find a cheaper plan for a route to the sea, you must bear in mind that this transportation is needed from the Mississippi Valley, and that the country east of the State of Ohio has all the railroads that are necessary to carry all the freights than can possibly accumulate. We want transportation to carry off the immense productions of this valley, and think that Congress should give its sanction to that enterprise which will cost the Government the least money, and confer the greatest and most lasting benefits on the country.

Another proposition is to widen and deepen the canals that run eastward from the lakes through the State of New York to the sea. This is a good suggestion, and would meet with hearty approbation but for the reason that it utterly fails on account of its latitude to come into active competition with the railroads for a number of months in each year, which periods mark the rise in all eastward railroad freights. Another difficulty in the way of this enterprise is that it does not reach the center of the great producing region, and any enterprise that will not do that will fail to bring the relief we desire.

In this connection you must remember that the producing region is ever on the march westward, and in a few years will be west of the Mississippi River, in that grand undeveloped country that borders on the Missouri River and its tributaries.

The question is, then, can we find any other route to the sea that will not be met with the difficulties we have alluded to in regard to other proposed routes. If we believe the evidence of the most talented and cultivated civil engineers that belong to our country, we have a natural channel almost ready for the work we are in so much need of, and one, too, that can be made the most wonderful highway for interior commerce yet known to the world. Anticipating the wants of this rich country, which at no distant day will be the granary for Europe as well as our own country, a beneficent Providence has traced through it the longest natural channel, a ready-made canal, and better adapted to the wants and necessities of this people than any artificial work can be. This canal, starting from the very door of the great producing region, only requires of man the exercise of a moderate degree of ingenuity and enterprise to make it all that is necessary to meet the wants of the present and unborn generations. It is not a sluggish canal, with its locks and dams, but a continual flow, for thousands of miles, ready to bear upon its waters all the way down to the sea, without artificial power of any kind, the annual crops of this vast region. It is a natural current from the very place of production to the sea; and nature, as if this grand inland artery of commerce was not enough, makes the currents of the sea take up the vessel thus emptied into the ocean, and carry it up the Atlantic coast to all the great commercial cities of our country.

This current that is said to flow about four miles per hour will of its own force, land a vessel from the Saint Louis wharf in the city of New York in forty days. Does it not seem like folly to attempt the building of an artificial canal or work that can possibly compete with this free, natural channel in cheapness of construction, or adaptability to the very wants we are legislating to satisfy? Is not its cheapness and naturalness the very combination we desire? Will it not be the very competition we are hunting for: to bring these monopolies to a sense of justice and the proper relations that should exist between them and the producer? If we want a sharp and severe competitive race for western produce, between railroad, river, and lake transportation, can we devise any plan that will bring about this delightful consummation, and that carries with it so many decided merits?

I do not deny, sir, that other routes have many claims that recommend them to the judgment, but when we consider that all these different plans will some day be necessary to our commerce, and the full development of our country, we should seek first that means of relief that is least costly to the Government. To enlarge our canals, or to build double-track railroads, every man knows, without calculation, will cost the country millions more than it will to prepare these natural channels for all kind of navigation.

It is estimated that a double-track railway from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic coast will cost at least $75,000 per mile, the distance being from one thousand to twelve hundred miles. The cost of the road will therefore be $75,000,000. Now, take it for granted, which in my judgment will never be the case, that these routes will carry freights as cheap as the Mississippi River, see the difference in the cost of construction, the repairing and running expenses. It would cost the Government nothing for running expenses on the Mississippi River, as it would be a highway free to all, and never could, in the nature of things, be a monopoly. The Government would only have the expense of repair on this water-route, and that, with the difference in cost of construction and the climatic influences that are against it, will complete the conviction in all unprejudiced minds that this route is superior to all others.

We are so prone to look at all questions with a sectional or selfish eye. If we cannot see that an immediate benefit results to our constituency, we think it is economy on the part of the Government to abstain from all appropriations. The members from New York City would very likely sit still and let us vote any amount of money for the harbor defenses of that city, but would be on the alert to defend the United States Treasury against appropriations to go in any other direction. It is very natural for men to do this way, but we must get rid of our small contracted notions when we stand in the presence of a grand national idea. Such a one we maintain the cheap-transportation question to be.

All the people of our great country are either producers or consumers, and any measure that will cheapen the freight on a bushel of grain from the West to the East will increase the price for the producer and decrease it for the consumer. The heavy freight that is now charged on a bushel of corn or wheat is added to the price the consumer pays to the miller. The miller, the producer, nor the consumer, gets any benefit from this heavy duty that is levied upon everything the farmer takes to market, but goes into the pockets of men who organize themselves into corporate bodies, which, in law and fact, have no souls, and cannot feel for the poverty of the producer and the famine of the consumer, so long as their coffers are filled with the unholy treasure thus wrung from the poor.

Your millers in New York and New Jersey go to Illinois for the corn which they grind into meal for their patrons, and pay for it from fifteen to eighteen cents per bushel. Gentlemen who are members of this Congress will tell you that the same corn costs them at the mill from sixty to seventy cents. This is a tremendous difference, and we may well inquire what is the cause of it, and where it goes to? It is the freight on a bushel of corn from Illinois to New York; and goes to the railroads, paid alike by the producer and consumer.

Many unthinking people are in the habit of talking about this question as though the eastern people were not interested in it, and the West was to receive all the benefits from it. This is a very great mistake, as the price the eastern mechanic and laborer pays for his food is, in part at least, the cost of carrying it to market. This is a very small matter to the rich, but to the laboring poor in eastern manufactories it possibly bears with greater hardship than on the western farmer. High-priced transportation, like high taxes, becomes an unbearable burden to the people, and blights the prosperity of all countries.

Prosperity begets prosperity. You make the great producing region prosperous, and what is the result? They pay the debts they owe to the manufacturer, and buy more largely of his goods. The market for nearly all the manufactured goods of the East is in the West and South. What a piece of folly it would be, then, for the East to legislate in such a way as to retard the prosperity of those who purchase their manufactures. The great laboring population of the country—the producers and consumers—are alike interested in any measure that will insure the easy, sure, and cheap transportation of the food of the great Mississippi Valley to the door of the consumer in the East. This is why it is a national question, permeating every State in this broad Union; the New England States realizing the benefit as much as the States of the great valley. It is a national work in the largest sense of that term, and in its lasting and far-reaching benefits will be a national blessing.

What are the difficulties, then, in the way to prevent the Government from conferring this great boon upon the people?

It is not on account of a doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to regulate the commerce of the country; that is conceded on all hands. Neither is it on account of the cost of the undertaking, because Congress has repeatedly loaned to public enterprises much greater sums than will accomplish this. Neither is it on account of the possible extravagance of freight charges that may be made more than on other contemplated ways to the sea; because it is demonstrated by well-attested facts even now, before the work of deepening a channel is begun, to be almost as cheap as any other route to the sea or to the Atlantic sea-board. Neither is it the cost of construction; for no well-informed man will deny but that it will require three times as much to build competent transportation by any other route. Neither is it on account of its latitude and climate; for it is the only water-route that is free from winter obstructions, and statistics show that full as much grain becomes spoiled in the shipment to and from Chicago East as from New Orleans.

Is it not passing strange that Congress does not act in this matter, when the knowledge is with every man of a manifest lack of economical transportation; when it is well known that not more than one-twentieth of the great West is now in cultivation, and that almost every season corn is raised in such surplus quantities as to be burned for fuel or left in the field to rot, and at the same time the population of our great sea-board cities and those of the manufacturing States are suffering because the produce of the West cannot reach them by an economical route? It will cheapen food and lift a burden from every laboring man's shoulders. The interchange of products will give new life to trade, and revivify the decaying industries of the country, making all classes, in every section, the richer and happier. What excuse, then, can you make to your constituents for not giving your influence to a measure that will be so vast in its ever-increasing benefits.

Heretofore you have given away unnumbered millions of acres of the public land to build railroads, over which the farmer has no freedom, and is compelled to submit to extortions as though the Government had never given a cent to build them. You have drawn on the public Treasury with a prodigal hand for coast and harbor purposes, where all the foreign commerce is insignificant in comparison with the internal commerce of the Mississippi Valley, not yet more than thirty years old.

The best engineers have with singular unanimity reported the feasibility of the enterprise; thinking men all over the country have united in this belief that it will confer more lasting benefits to the entire Union of States than any enterprise ever before presented to Congress.

We hope our great commercial sea-board cities will not allow a foolishly short-sighted fear of losing trade to prevent them from giving their influence to this great work. Every dollar that is made for the farmer will result to their benefit. With it he pays old debts and makes new purchases. It will fill up the vacant lands of the West with a thriving business population, and this prosperity as certain as fate will make the great commercial centers more opulent and powerful. It is the sure way of spreading the commercial supremacy of great business centers, and whether the produce of the West leaves the Mississippi Valley by way of the lakes, or by the through-line railroads, or by the Mississippi River to the sea, and thence by the Gulf Stream to New York, that city will still hold in her grasp the scepter of commercial empire on the American continent, and from her Wall street will radiate the financial power that will surely control the commerce of this country in all time to come. The water-route by this river to the sea will be only another convenience to her commerce, and add new territory to her dominion.

In order that we may perfectly understand and realize the great necessities of the West and Northwest we must consider the magnitude of the productions of this country. Their amount has been collected from a great many sources by intelligent western gentlemen, and although not as accurate as they could wish, it seems so near the truth as to be available. The statement is contained in the memorial of the Saint Louis Merchants' Exchange, with appendix thereto, the most exhaustive paper yet prepared on this question.

Without wearying the patience of the House with statistics in detail, I will only repeat some aggregate amounts ascertained by the intelligent gentlemen who made this valuable report. Thus the movement of grain eastward, the estimated surplus, and the remainder for shipment to the southward, or for superfluous consumption, in the report alluded to, are thus stated:

Grain.	Eastward.	Surplus.	South or unsold.
	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.
Wheat	96, 500, 000	116, 000, 000	19, 500, 000
Corn	106, 000, 000	190, 000, 000	84, 000, 000
Other grain	36, 000, 000	40, 000, 000	4, 000, 000
Total	238, 500, 090	346, 000, 000	107, 500, 000

Or, 6,190,000 tons moved eastward; 9,300,000 tons estimated surplus; and 3,200,000 tons shipped to the South or unsold.

This estimate is only for the grain crop, which every one knows, is only a portion of the freight that passes over our roads to the East.

In the same report the estimate for weight of animals moved eastward is 1,500,000 tons; of meat packed at different points in the Mississippi Valley 550,000 tons; 60,000,000 pounds of wool; 170,000,000 pounds of tobacco; 60,000 tons of spirits; 10,000 tons of flax; 42,000 tons of flaxseed; 10,000 tons of hemp; a surplus of 22,000 tons of butter, and cotton that was shipped northward and eastward 130,600 tons, and many other products consisting of vegetables, fruits, iron ore and pig-iron which make up an aggregate that startles the unthinking mind by its magnitude.

It is impossible to arrive at any certain estimate of the corn production of the Mississippi Valley, and the fact that tons of it remain unsold at even fifteen cents per bushel is conclusive that we cannot tell the great loss that annually falls on this section from lack of transportation for this article alone. It is well understood that it cannot be shipped at present rates unless it is reduced to a more compact and valuable form by feeding it to cattle or hogs, or distilling it into alcohol. The last would be remunerative were it not for the internal-revenue or export tax that is levied on this production.

Thus you see the magnitude of production is almost beyond computation, and exceeds that of any other country. The aggregate cereal crop of all the nations of Europe in 1868 was reported to the international statistical congress at the Hague to be sixteen bushels to the head, while the cereal product in the UnitedStates in 1870 at a low estimate will reach thirty-five bushels.

Now, in order that you may look at this question fairly, and do the whole country justice, after contemplating the immense production of the agricultural region West at the present time, you must, if you would legislate wisely, also consider that agriculture is only in its infancy, and must in the nature of things go on, opening and tilling new lands until it reaches an amount almost beyond calculation. What will it be in twenty years from this day if no blight fall upon the industries of the country, and how much transportation will it require to carry it to market? I see it stated in a preamble to resolutions offered before the Chamber of Commerce of New York that if the ten millions of surplus grain in the West were ground into flour or meal and placed in barrels holding five bushels each, it would require eighty million barrels, and would fill forty thousand Erie Canal boats, each carrying two hundred and fifty tons; or one million railway freight-cars each carrying ten tons, which would make an average of about twenty-eight hundred cars per day.

It is a necessity that is recognized by the entire country that the great natural water-routes should be utilized and made subservient to the high commercial destiny that awaits this people.

The beginning of this great work must be a canal from the Mississippi River into the ocean, or the deepening the channel of the river where it empties into the Gulf. I am no practical engineer, and leave that question with those who are capable of handling it. They tell us the canal is feasible, and a distinguished civil engineer of my own State, Captain James B. Eads, who is ranked among the most learned and accomplished of his profession both in this country and Europe, gives it as his opinion that the proposed plan of deepening the mouth of the river is the cheapest and most feasible. As a parallel case he refers to the achievement of Sir Charles A. Hartley in securing a permanent depth of twenty feet in the Sulina mouth of the Danube. It was accomplished by building a solid stone wall a mile and a quarter long, which confined a large volume of the water to this one channel. To adopt the language of the Saint Louis Dispatch:

> The practical result which followed the deepening of the Sulina from nine feet in 1857 to twenty feet in 1872 was very great. In 1853, 2,490 vessels, measuring 339,457 tons, left the port, and in 1869, 2,831 vessels, measuring 676,960 tons. The increase of vessels is slight, but the tonnage is doubled. The reduction in the number of wrecks had been from an average of 39 in 10,000 leaving the river from 1855 to 1866 to an average of 8 in 10,000 in 1861 to 1869, and of 2 in 10,000 since 1870. The charges on vessels have been also reduced from two to three francs per quarter for lightering grain across the bar in 1857 to a total charge of two francs per registered ton. These are great results, and as the Danube is an alluvium-bearing river like the Mississippi, it is fair to suppose that a similar treatment will produce similar results.

But I did not intend to argue in favor of the adoption of either plan, as the knowledge I possess is very imperfect. A permanent depth of water at the mouth sufficient to pass the largest ocean vessels is what we need to make the Mississippi, and its great tributary, the Missouri, available for commerce.

The Missouri River runs through the center of the State of Missouri, and washes the borders of the great agricultual States of Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, and vast Territories, having steamboat navigation for twenty-five hundred miles, running all the way through a country of unparalleled fertility, growing to perfection all the grains, grasses, and fruits of this latitude, and holding in its hidden cavities iron, coal, lead, salt, zinc, copper, saltpeter, marble, and cement. I have not time to enumerate the wonderful resources of this favored region; but I wish to impress it upon this Congress that this river is the natural channel for all the commerce, agricultural and mineral, that will grow out of its abundant richness, and should therefore receive its early attention in appropriations commensurate with the great interests involved. It is larger than the Mississippi, and all I have said in regard to the necessities of river improvements as the cheapest route for commerce applies in a pre-eminent degree to this the greatest river of the continent.

Mr. Speaker, this question of the cheap transportation of the products of the West to the Atlantic sea-board and foreign countries is second in importance to no other now before the American Congress. It is no petty sectional interest, in which the welfare of a few hundred thousand people are involved, but millions of the sons of toil, who have for these many years submitted patiently and unmurmuringly to the extortions of monopolists; who have paid the tariff revenues by which eastern manufacturers have amassed fortunes, and for which they have received in return no corresponding benefit; who have been imposed upon by the financial system of the Government, until crushed to the very earth they demand that the Government shall cease giving its protection to measures alone which rob and oppress them and build up a small interest and favored class in the country. We have had enough of class and sectional legislation, and it is unworthy this great nation that Congress does not push to the front some great national idea, the good influences of which will ramify every section of this country. Such we claim for this enterprise, the advantages of which will not only be to those who live in the valleys washed by the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers, but every city and town, however remote or obscure, will reap its portion of the harvest.

The time has arrived when you must do something to help this people. They are deeply dissatisfied with the burdens imposed upon them, and very justly consider themselves badly treated by the Government. They complain that Congress has never recognized the fact that the productions of a country are its real wealth; that it has rather acted on the principle that the great producing class was in no need of the protecting hand of the Government, but must be made to support all other industries; that all the articles they purchase are saddled with a tariff duty; that the banking system established by Government is such that the agricultural regions get only a portion of the money to which the law entitles them, while the manufacturing States get largely over their share; that while you make a protective tariff to foster and take care of the manufactories of the Eastern States, it has never been thought necessary to give the farmer protection. He pays his portion of the tax to carry on the industries of the Eastern States and gets no corresponding favors in return.

Mr. FIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. FIELD. I do not wish to antagonize the views of the gentleman in regard to internal improvements. When the question of internal improvements is brought before the House for action I will support them. But I understood the gentleman to say that the West is taxed for the benefit of the East; and I would like to have some explanation in what way this is done. I understand the gentleman to say that the great agricultural States——

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I do not yield further. The gentleman asks me a question to which it would take me all day to reply. The gentleman will find, however, that as I proceed with my remarks I will give substantially an answer to his question, or at least to the question which I suppose he intended to ask me, in regard to the tax the western people are paying for the benefit of the East, and getting no adequate return therefor. I will say now that, on the goods consumed in the West, there is a protective tariff paid, and the farmer has to pay that tariff, as well as the price of the goods. That is how the West pays a tax for the benefit of the East.

Mr. FIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I would suggest that if the western people did their own manufacturing they would avoid all this difficulty.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Yes, sir; and if the East raised all their own agricultural produce they would not be dependent on the West. But I decline to be interrupted any further. I did not intend to debate the tariff question at all in this argument.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is much worse than that; he is made to pay a tax on the produce of his own labor. The planter cannot sell his crop of tobacco to his neighbor, but is forced to hunt up a licensed dealer and have that tax deducted from the price of his crop. The production of hemp was once the largest and most remunerative of all the crops in my district, but by removing the tariff on articles that come into competition with it they can no longer raise it at a profit. When they attempt to reduce the bulk and increase the value of their corn so that it will bear shipment, a tax is levied on the alcohol.

The farmer of the West feels that if this system of taxation is to go on, and his own labor or the result of it does not advance in the same ratio, that it cannot end otherwise than in total bankruptcy. They are a thrifty, temperate, and industrious people, but oppressed on the one hand by unjust legislation and on the other by railroad monopolies, they feel almost without hope. Go and talk to these farmers who have followed the plow from boyhood, and they will tell you that they struggle and economize as they have never done before; and yet they have nothing left at the end of each year; or, worse, that a mortgage is slowly but remorselessly eating away the homestead itself. This is the real history of the thousands who are tilling western farms.

But, brave and honest men as they are, they do not intend to be ground into dust in the service of monopolies, railroad or otherwise, without a struggle. They see their danger, and are rising to meet it. There is not a fireside in the humblest cabin around which they are not discussing this question, firing each other's hearts for a death struggle with parties or administrations who will not hear their cry for justice and relief. Republicans and democrats, forgetting the hostility of years, and gallant soldiers who lately struggled in deadly combat, are falling into line and swearing fealty to a new flag, whose motto is "Forward," until their fertile fields are rescued from the blighting and withering curse of class legislation.

I know it is the habit of some eastern politicians to make light of this uprising, calling it communism. It is simply an exercise of the instinct for self-preservation, a war of self-defense; and unless it is met fairly and honestly, they will hurl the last man from power who stands between them and their rights.

It is well to remember that they are no contemptible foes for any power to face. They are intelligent and patriotic citizens; they furnished the soldiers for both armies in the late war, and form the voting population of at least twenty-five great States. Therefore I say beware; they mean to be foes unless it is shown to them that they are to have an equal share of the benefits as well as the burdens of taxation.

Let me appeal to you to do them justice, add immeasurably to the wealth of the country, bring together in the intimate business relations of life all sections of the Union, forever blotting out the traces of the late conflict, and lighting up all the country with a blaze of prosperity.

THE CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY AND THE REMEDY THEREFOR DISCUSSED.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, the great question just now with the people is, what relief will Congress give us? It is like the cry of the swimmer whose strength is spent, or that of the distressed Israelite under his task-master. The people have intrusted us, their chosen representatives, with high and sacred duties. Their eyes are even now turned upon us, and their hopes are elevated. It is in the power of the American Congress to give relief to a distressed country, and it should be its exalted work to acomplish that end.

TAXATION.

Let us now, Mr. Speaker, look at some of the causes of this distress. And first I mention the burdens of taxation. Almost every article used by the laboring man is taxed either indirectly by a tariff, or directly, by the internal revenue. The tariff lays a tax on iron, steel, cotton cloth, woolen cloth, spool thread, copperas, indigo, madder, medicines, shirts, vests, pants, coats, socks, shoes, caps, and hats; not even allowing the blessed Word of God to escape, there being a tax of 35 per cent. on the Bible, together with a thousand and one things too tedious to mention. The humblest negro in the land pays a tax on his mattock, his hoe, and his bull-tongue plow, while upon every article of his shabby apparel, from top to toe, the iron fingers of the tariff hold their merciless grip. It is all in vain for the poverty-stricken mother of the country to sing to her child—

Hush, ye little pet ye,
Do not fret ye,
The Black Douglass shall not get ye—for the black vise of the tariff has them all in its jaws. The truth is, sir, that we are taxed from the cradle to the grave. If spirits should be needed, for medical purposes at the birth, none can be obtained without the inevitable stamp being affixed. I heard of a law-abiding Dutchman in Lincoln County, North Carolina, who had a son born unto him. On the morning of the happy event he was hastening down street, when a man called to him, "Hallo! what are you in such a hurry about?" Our hero answered, "Don't sthop me; I am hurrying to get de stamps to put on de baby before de revenues man comes." Neither, Mr. Speaker, can the last earthly scene escape the tax. The very screws upon the coffin, the handles thereof, the tacks, the white lining, the black cover, the varnish, all, all have a place in the endless catalogue; while, to cap the climax, the spade which smooths the turf above the dead contributes its part to the immense revenues of the land, reminding us that even in death we are not forgotten—by the tax-collector.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Now, sir, in addition to the indirect taxes we have the direct taxes on spirits, wines, manufactured tobacco, leaf tobacco, snuff, cigars, &c., and this brings me to consider the internal-revenue laws with their burdens. I, then, invoke the attention of gentlemen to the inequalities of these laws, bearing as they do unjustly upon certain sections of our country. The Constitution says that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." This suggests the principle that taxes may not be laid upon one section which another is free from. I will ask the Clerk to read from the act of June 6, 1872, page 50, Revenue Laws.

The Clerk read as follows:

Dealers in leaf tobacco, except retail dealers in leaf tobacco, as hereinafter defined, shall each pay $25. Retail dealers in leaf tobacco shall each pay $500, and, if their annual sales exceed $1,000, shall each pay, in addition thereto, fifty cents for every dollar in excess of $1,000 of their sales. Every person shall be regarded as a retail dealer in leaf tobacco whose business it is to sell leaf tobacco in quantities less than an original hogshead, case, or bale; or who shall sell it directly to consumers, or to persons other than dealers in leaf tobacco who have paid a special tax as such.

Mr. VANCE. Now here is a tax bearing directly upon the product of the farmer in the tobacco-growing regions, while in other sections the product of the farmer is not taxed. This is a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. Why not tax corn, wheat, hay, fruit, &c., in the non-tobacco growing sections? Ah! you say, these things constitute the farmer's bread; they must not be taxed. I answer, so does tobacco in the sections where it is grown; it is emphatically his bread, for from its proceeds he buys his bread. The proud boast of our country is equal laws. Here is an opportunity to have that boast carried out, by repealing the taxes on leaf tobacco. You ask why it is that the farmer suffers by the tax. Here is the reason: The law absolutely cuts off the sale of tobacco at retail, by its shameful provisions; and the producer—not being able to sell to the consumer—must, of necessity, sell to the wholesale dealer in tobacco, or to the manufacturer, and that fact controls the price. If the farmer could sell to the consumer by retail, it would enable him to get twenty and twenty-five cents for tobacco that only brings him five cents at the factory. This act, therefore, discriminates to the favor of the manufacturer, the monopolist, and against the small farmer. Gentlemen will see that it is unjust. Let me give a case: A gentleman worked a number of hands on his farm; he sold them tobacco in the leaf at twenty cents; after the 1st of July, 1872, he carried the residue of his tobacco to the factory, and got ten cents per pound; he then purchased manufactured tobacco for his laborers, and they had to pay from sixty to eighty cents per pound therefor. Both parties were injured. Another important view of this matter is, that the laboring man is almost of necessity compelled to have tobacco. Right or wrong, he has contracted the habit of its use, and cannot well dispense with it. With him it is not a luxury, but a necessity.

OPPRESSIVE FEATURES OF THE LAWS.

I invite the attention of the House to the arbitrary and oppressive features of these laws. Of course I cannot in one brief address point them all out; but will ask gentlemen to examine the rigid and tyrannical character of the penalties. Take, for instance, the penalty for removing tobacco before it is stamped, which is a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, with imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years. Another: the failure to destroy a stamp upon a tobacco-box after it has been emptied involves an absolute penalty of a fine of $100, and twenty days' imprisonment. Another: distilled spirits left on the premises where made, after the tax has been paid, works a forfeiture thereof. Another still: before a man can begin the business of distilling he must give notice in writing, and a failure to do so works a penalty of $1,000, and on conviction a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $2,000. (Section 6, act July 20, 1868, page 56.)

These laws even require a "sign" to be put up on the side or end of the factory, the letters to be three inches long; and a failure to do so works a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500. (Page 87, section 64.) This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, in the history of the world that a "sign" was required.

All the above fines and penalties, and many others, are positive and unbending. I ask gentlemen, in all candor, if these penalties ought not to be left to the discretion of the court, so that judgment could be entered according to strict justice.

Let me mention now how men have suffered from these outrageous laws. Not long since there was a man in the jail of one of the western counties of North Carolina for selling a neighbor one quart of spirits in a case of sickness. Another, in Yancey County, had a sick wife. Under advice he made, or had made, a few gallons of whisky for her; and it nearly proved his ruin. Still another, as I was credibly informed, traveled one hundred miles on foot to attend the Federal court for selling one and a half pounds of tobacco in the leaf. Once more, and I had this statement from the son of a man who went to Greenville, South Carolina, and bought several barrels of spirits: He was coming on home with his wagon, without concealment, as the liquors were regularly stamped by the collector in South Carolina, when a revenue man, with his assistant, commanded him to halt, seized the team and contents, carried all to Asheville, and the owner never recovered his liquors nor secured redress for the outrage. Why, Mr. Speaker, some of these revenue men, when there is liquor about, can outsmell a certain nameless bird; but I will say it is neither the eagle nor the crow. There is a man in jail now in one of the counties of my district, sentenced to six months' imprisonment, for staying one night at a distillery at the request of the owner, and letting a neighbor have one quart of spirits, notwithstanding the man brought word from the owner to let him have it. There are eight or ten persons now in one of the jails for the most trifling offenses. The judge has ruled (and correctly) that if the district attorney prays judgment he is bound to fine $1,000 and imprison six months, simply for selling one quart of whisky without license.

Is not this a bloody law indeed? Great caution ought to be exercised before a man is indicted, and no single act in violation of the law for selling, or distilling, (for a useful purpose,) ought to be indictable; but those only should be indicted who make a practice of distilling and selling to make money in violation of law. The law should further provide that all assessments should be void except the officer goes in person to the individual to be taxed and takes his statement on oath. Assessments are often made through information derived from third parties, and thus the man's property is condemned without notice.

Now, I desire gentlemen to note this important statement: There is collected, in gross, (according to the report of the honorable Commissioner of Internal Revenue,) in the seventh district of North Carolina, the sum of $32,955.17. I have it from what I consider reliable authority that the last term of the Federal court for that district, held at Asheville, cost about $22,000. Add now, if you please, the salaries of officers, and how much clear revenue do you get in that district? The report of the honorable Attorney-General of the United States shows the expenses of the two districts in North Carolina to be as follows:

Eastern	$73,834 45
Western	64,948 35
Making	138,782 80

Divide this expense between seven districts, and it shows to each $19,826.11. Now a considerable portion of the $22,000 referred to cannot be in the estimate, for pay of witnesses, jurors, &c. The case is decidedly clear that very little, if any, profit comes to the United States Government from the district mentioned. I need not say that this unfortunate state of things grows out of the oppressive nature of the laws, and particularly the manner in which and for which arrests are made by authority of the United States commissioners.

Do not gentlemen see that wisdom dictates a repeal of these obnoxious laws, as they do not make the people any better, and they are rather expensive? The truth of the whole matter, Mr. Speaker, is that the people are treated exactly as if they were a known set of rascals. I am hostile to any such legislation, and if I had my view carried out it would be to abolish the whole system, and commit the collection of the internal revenue (if absolutely necessary to be collected) to the States under the laws of Congress, so that only one set of officers would have to deal with the people; the taxes when collected to be paid over to the United States Treasury by the treasurers of the States. I would allow the people to render an account of their taxes to the proper authorities, on oath, setting forth what they are liable for under the law. I believe in showing the people that we have confidence in their honesty, and thus encourage and strengthen them in the path of integrity.

UNITED STATES BONDS.

I stated awhile since that everything was taxed; there is, however, an exception. I allude to United States bonds. Look, Mr. Speaker, at the picture: even the salt in the hoe-cake of the poorest man in the land is taxed, and yet the pampered bondholder owns his millions, and pays no tax thereon. Is it right? But, says one, would you tax the bonds now, when the agreement was not to do so? No; I would stand by the contract, and that is what has not been done when it was agreed to pay bonds in gold which were to be paid in currency. Look again, if you please, at another painful distinction. The bondholder is to be paid in gold, is he, while the one-legged and one-armed soldiers, maimed for life, are to have their miserable pittance in greenbacks? The bondholder, I take it, bought the bond not entirely from patriotism, but because it was a safe and paying investment. The soldier bared his breast to the battle, and gave his blood freely, because he loved his flag and his country. As between the two, my warm side is for the one-armed and one-legged men.

WHAT IS COLLECTED BY THESE TAXES?

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, there was collected off the people the enormous sum of $188,089,522.70 by the tariff, and $113,729,314.14 by the internal revenue. Now, what is the reason given for this taxation? It is that the current expenses of the Government have to be met, which were last year the sum of $290,345,245.33, including $104,750,688.44 interest on the public debt; and also that a portion of the principal of the national debt must be paid, and there was paid, as the report shows, the sum of $43,392,959.34.

Then arises the question, and with that we ought to grapple, what steps shall we take to relieve the pressure and reduce the taxes?

THE REMEDY.

Well, in the first place, I suggest that Congress proceed to enact laws which will cheapen the cost of collecting duties on importations and the internal taxes. Every useless port of entry ought to either be abolished or the salary of its officers made in proportion to its receipts.

In the second place, the expenditures of the Government should be reduced in every proper way. This work is resting to a great extent upon the committees who have charge of these grave and important matters. They have full access to papers and documents, as well as confidential communications with the heads of Departments. They ought to be able to probe these expenditures to the very core, and to them the country is looking for wise and proper recommendations. Now, it is rather difficult for a member not on the committee, and not in the secrets of the Administration, to understand why some of these items are so much, but he can reason and calculate, and if we take the ordinary expenditures under Buchanan's administration for 1860, we find the sum to be $60,010,112.58, including everything except the interest and principal paid on the public debt, with a population of 30,000,000. This, you will observe, is about $2 per capita. Now, take the year 1873, and we find that the honorable Secretary of the Treasury reports the sum of $180,488,636.90 for the same items, (exclusive of principal and interest on the public debt,) with a population of 40,000,000, making the sum of $4.52 per capita. We further find in the report for 1873, the following items:

Civil expenses	$19,348,521 01
Foreign intercourse	1,571,362 85
Miscellaneous, civil, including public buildings, light-houses, collecting revenues, &c.	52,408,226 20

These items are included in the gross amount as before given, and I mention them now to show how large they are. I ask, in all sincerity, cannot these enormous expenses be reduced?

Thirdly, I favor an increase in the currency as essential to relief, and that certainly should come as speedily as possible. There is not money enough in the country, and particularly in the South. The people cannot prosper for want of capital. Take the State of North Carolina, for instance. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that North Carolina is entitled, according to population, to $4,918,022, and by apportionment on wealth to $1,539,900. The actual circulation is $1,819,300 or $1.70 per capita, against $5.26 in 1862. The deficiency to North Carolina is $4,638,622. It is impossible for a country to grow with $3,399,298 less money in circulation than was there twelve years ago. How shall we increase the currency and get it among the people in the States where it is needed? By retiring the national debt, as far as possible, with currency, and thus relieve the people of that much debt, principal and interest. But gentlemen say that the money will drift to the great centers of trade and to the manufacturing districts. So it will; but whenever there is more money in the sections named than is needed the rates of interest will go down and capital will seek other sections, and banks will be established where rates of interest are better. This is what we need in North Carolina, and must have.

Another means of relief is the reduction of the Army and Navy to the lowest point consistent with safety; and I trust the Committee on Military Affairs will give careful attention to that important matter. No real friend of his country, Mr. Speaker, would like to see our country exposed for want of defensive preparations; and yet, a standing army, in the European sense, is not a favorite policy in America. The use we have for soldiers now is to take care of our forts, arsenals, &c., and to protect our frontiers; this and nothing more at present. The safety, at last, of our country is in the virtue and integrity as well as valor of our citizen soldiery.

Allusion has already been made to the glorious record of the volunteer force on both sides of the late war. No true man can call it up without feeling his bosom swell with emotion. The confederate army was almost born in a day, and yet, without a navy, it maintained a four years' fight against the grandest and best equipped army in the world, volunteers on both sides. And to-day, Mr. Speaker, in a just quarrel, (and I trust our Government will never have an unjust one,) at the first sound of the drum the veterans in blue and in gray would spring from the peaceful walks of life and join the younger men of the hour in the dense and stern array. I avouch for my own mountain region that gorge, and plain, and hill-top would so swell with men, and shout would be answered with shout—

> Till every tuft of broom gives life
> To plaided warrior armed for strife.

But, sir, the anxious desire of all good men is for the peace of the world. The dreadful burdens of the nations are brought about by wars. Elihu Burritt, the learned blacksmith, has published some statistics on this subject, and we will do well to ponder them.

The war debt of the world, on the 1st day September, 1870, (the day of Sedan,) was:

Great Britain	$3,840,000,000
Continental Europe	10,394,064,000
America	3,673,536,000
Asia	502,636,000
Africa	190,344,000
Australasia	171,571,000
Making in round figures	20,000,000,000

The estimated interest upon this vast sum is $1,300,000,000, and the cost of keeping up standing armies $1,300,000,000, making in all the sum of $2,600,000,000 annually wrung from the hard earnings of the children of toil. While this is true, we have the appalling and astounding statement that only about $26,000,000 are annually contributed to propagate the gospel of our Lord in the world.

These are some of the burdens pressing upon forty million people; and not these alone, for the burdens of war have borne hard upon the thirteen hundred millions of earth's teeming children of all colors and all nationalities, from the far-off regions of the north pole, incased in eternal ice, to where the tropics glow and the Southern Cross blazes in beauty forever. Surely, in view of this humiliating record, the cry of all lovers of peace and good will should go up to the Creator of men to hasten the termination of all national strife, for "He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; He breaketh the bow and cutteth the spear in sunder; He burneth the chariot in the fire."

Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that, under wise and wholesome laws, bearing alike upon the rich and upon the poor, our whole country may become a vast and happy home for the people, where the music of ten thousand spindles shall only be excelled by the busy hum of the cheerful and contented multitude.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, requested the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the government of the District of Columbia.

CLAIMS FOR QUARTERMASTER'S SUPPLIES.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a few remarks on the third and fourth sections of the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The House, in Committee of the Whole, have proceeded with the bill to the second section, which, together with the third and fourth sections, transfers the fund set aside to meet the claims pending in the Departments of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General of Subsistence for the claims there pending—transfers all those claims to the claims commission established by the act of March 3, 1873. This change, it is claimed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who has charge of the bill, will be advantageous to both the claimants and the Government: the claimants, because it will enable them to be sooner paid; to the Government, because the claims will then be submitted to the examination of gentlemen whose years of experience peculiarly qualify them for their work.

If I were convinced by this argument I would cheerfully support this measure; but, on the contrary, with such an examination of the questions involved as I have been able to give them, I am satisfied that while the Government will gain no material advantage by the proposed transfer, this change will work a direct and positive injury to claimants, in the repudiation of a large number of claims now pending in the Quartermaster-General's Office, and a still further delay in the payment of other claims which have already been shamefully delayed, causing in many instances great hardship to a class of loyal citizens of the country; and I find, sir, that I am not alone in the opinion just expressed. I submit the following evidence of the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster-General, taken before the Committee on Military Affairs upon this subject. I will first ask the Clerk to read the evidence of Quartermaster-General Meigs.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Can you, without reduction of the Army, reduce your force of civil and military employés, the detailed men and others?

General MEIGS. I do not think that we have now more than is necessary for the prompt transaction of business, the settlement of accounts, and the answering of the innumerable questions that come to the Department. A considerable amount of force in my office is employed in the settlement of claims; and they would be dispensed with if House bill 1009 should become law. A large reduction of hired men has just been ordered, because the balances of appropriations are not sufficient to do the work now doing.

The CHAIRMAN. If that bill should pass, a number of your clerks might be discharged?

General MEIGS. Yes; I should be able to discharge all of them that are entirely employed in that business. I do not know precisely the number; I think it is some twelve or fifteen.

The CHAIRMAN. In point of fact, would that save the Government from the employment of a like number of clerks under another head?

General MEIGS. Somebody else must employ the clerks to do the work, or leave it undone.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I see it stated that about thirty clerks can be discharged from your office if these claims be transferred to the southern claims commission. Has there been that number of clerks employed in your office on that class of work?

General MEIGS. I think not, in my office; but if you take the whole number of persons who are employed on that work, throughout the country, in the Quartermaster's Department, I presume there are fifteen.

[NOTE.—General Meigs, after examining this report in his office, stated, in a letter to the chairman, the number of clerks and agents then employed at six in his office and nine elsewhere.]

Mr. THORNBURGH. I see it stated also that less than one thousand claims were decided by your office during last year. Does it require a force of thirty men to decide less than one thousand claims per annum?

General MEIGS. These claims are presented to my office generally prepared by claim agents, and supported by the oaths of the claimants themselves and of such other persons as they can get for witnesses. We find that those oaths or affidavits are apt to be very loosely made. Men seem to be ready (ignorantly, I think) to swear to the truth of what other people tell them, and a good deal of the testimony is hearsay, and a good deal of it is on judgment. A man will send in a claim for wood cut on his farm, and will claim at the rate of two hundred or three hundred cords to the acre. I find it necessary to send somebody to inspect the ground and to make an examination of the witnesses; and it frequently happens that where the witnesses are examined personally by an agent of the Quartermaster's Department they contradict themselves, and say that they gave their testimony on the faith of their neighbor who makes the claim, because they believed him to be an honest man. We find, where a hundred cords of wood per acre are claimed, by examination of the stumps, twenty, or thirty, or fifty cords to be an outside production of the land. That is only one instance of thousands. It takes a good many agents to make these examinations. The officers to whom I refer the claims for examination are the chief quartermasters in the various departments. In the neighborhood of Washington and West Virginia the claims are sent to the chief quartermaster here, who has two agents. The officer who makes the examination of claims in Tennessee and Kentucky is Colonel Ekin, who is chief quartermaster of the Department of the South, and who has several (six exactly) agents, whom he sends to Tennessee and Kentucky to make these local examinations. When I say that we will probably be able to discharge fifteen persons, I mean those persons employed by the various officers throughout the country as well as the persons employed in my office.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Are you of the opinion that if the claims should remain in your office for settlement you will be able to have them decided more rapidly than heretofore, owing to the fact that much of the work has been already done?

General MEIGS. These claims are all in a state of preparation. Many of them are now before these officers that I speak of, and I am receiving reports from them constantly. That much work is done towards a settlement of the claims. When they come to my office they are inspected. It occupies a large part of my time to examine the abstracts and to read the original testimony, when I find it necessary to do so. I then make up my mind as to whether the claim is just, whether the claimant was loyal, and how much ought to be allowed on the claim; and I indorse my opinion on the back of it and send it to the Third Auditor, recommending what I believe to be the legal and just allowance. That is my share of the work. There are a vast number of claims in that condition. They only want abstracting in many instances, or they are in the hands of the officers, ready to be returned. I think that to transfer them to any other tribunal, to new persons, who have no knowledge of the claims, may make some delay in their settlement. But I have been myself always of opinion that the best way to settle these claims is to appoint a moving commission, to go into the country, take testimony as to facts, and make an examination on the spot; and then to have some statute of limitation. There is no statute of limitation now, and probably, under the circumstances, it would not be just to have one. A claim is not the less just that the United States has failed to pay it when due, or that the owner has not been advised how to collect what is justly due to him for goods taken for public use. No lapse of time can wipe out justice. But, at the same time, if there were published in the various neighborhoods of the country advertisements that a certain commission, on a certain day, or for a certain number of days or weeks, at certain designated places, would receive claims and file them, and receive testimony and examine witnesses, then it would not be unjust to pass a statute of limitation, declaring that no claims presented after a certain length of time should be considered. * * * *

Mr. THORNBURGH. Do you require proof of loyalty to go back of the time when the supplies were furnished?

General MEIGS. I hold that if a man has taken the oath of loyalty before his property has been taken, and has behaved as a loyal man from that out, he is entitled to be considered loyal. As to what he had done before he took the oath, I do not think that that has legally any influence on his condition after he took the oath.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I ask the Clerk also to read some of the testimony given by Secretary Belknap before the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. THORNBURGH. Suppose that the Quartermaster's Department and the Commissary-General of Subsistence's Department were relieved of the settlement of the claims filed by persons who furnished stores for the Army during the late rebellion, would that materially lessen the expense of those Departments?

Secretary BELKNAP. It might lessen to a very small amount the expenses of the Departments, but I think it would involve an expenditure of a very large amount of money, by the payment by the Government of fraudulent claims.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Is there anything connected with settlement of those claims which makes the staff departments peculiarly fitted to pass upon questions arising under them?

Secretary BELKNAP. Yes, sir; there are a great many of those claims in the Departments, and they impose a burdensome duty on these Departments; but at the same time I am satisfied that their officers are peculiarly fitted to examine them, and I think that the result of that examination is the saving of a large amount of money to the Government.

Mr. THORNBURGH. There are nearly twenty thousand claims now pending before the claims commissioners. The first year, before they had fully organized their sessions and established their rules ready for work, they reported only one hundred and eighty claims decided. The second year shows a total of twenty-two hundred and nine claims; the third year twenty-four hundred and sixty-five cases. Now, at this rate, taking the last two years, which I think is fair, as a basis of calculation, it will require about six years longer to decide the just claims now pending before them.

Now add to those the twelve thousand claims that this bill proposes to transfer to the commissioners, open the door for more claims to be filed, which justice demands—and I may here say that a bill is already reported from the Committee on War Claims for that purpose—and the next generation may see these claims settled; but certainly we can never see them settled in this generation.

Again, I assert that a large number of just claims now being paid by the Quartermaster-General cannot and will not be paid, but will be decided adversely should this transfer be made. The acts of Congress authorizing the claims commissioners to decide claims, and authorizing the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General to decide claims, are worded in different language. The act of July 4, 1864, in relation to the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General provides that "they are to settle the claims of loyal citizens in States not in rebellion." The act of March 3, 1871, in relation to the claims commissioners uses this language: "It shall be their duty to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them of those citizens who remained loyal adherents to the cause of the Government during the war."

It is held by the claims commissioners that if a man committed an act that can be held to be disloyal, and afterward came forward and took the oath to support the Government, and kept that oath, and after he so took it remained loyal, and while so remaining loyal furnished supplies to the Government, even by contract with the Quartermaster-General or the Commissary-General, he cannot recover, because he did not remain loyal during the entire war, and therefore his claim cannot be considered.

Under the different proclamations of the President during the war many persons who had aided the rebellion by furnishing it supplies, and by other acts that are regarded as disloyal, came forward and took the oath of allegiance, with the promise upon the part of the Government that if they remained loyal they and their property should be protected. Many, very many, of these men never were at heart disloyal, but in the bottom of their hearts they ever uttered silent prayers for the safety of the Union. Surrounded by the enemy—perhaps too old or too timid to leave their families and risk their lives to escape to our lines—they remained at home, and so far submitted to the powers that were over them as to secure some safety to themselves, their families, and their property. Such men, when they had an opportunity, willingly came forward and took the oath, and have kept it. These men then furnished supplies to your Army. You contracted with them, and in many cases you gave them vouchers. In other cases, where no vouchers were given, the proper officers of the Government took up on their returns the property they received from them, and the records now on file in the Third Auditor's Office show that the debt is due them and unpaid. Every such claim now pending will be repudiated by the passage of this bill.

The act providing for the appointment of the claims commissioners gives them jurisdiction only of the claims of "citizens who remained loyal during the war." They hold that the class of persons just referred to are not loyal. In several cases which they have decided I know that the most rigid rule on this question has been applied. The act of July 4, 1864, giving jurisdiction to the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary Department, is differently worded. The claims commissioners construe the act giving them jurisdiction to mean that the claimants must have done willingly no act in aid of the rebellion. I repeat, that by this proposed transfer, without enlarging the jurisdiction of these commissioners, you strike down, wipe out, repudiate, every claim of the class just mentioned. To transfer these claims from a court that now has jurisdiction of them to a court that has not jurisdiction and is bound to decide them adversely is a wrong and an outrage which, I believe, this House will not be willing to perpetrate, and which I know the whole country would censure.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the commissioners of claims are able, honest men, endeavoring faithfully to discharge their duty. I know and regret that fraudulent claims are presented and fabulous prices are sometimes charged. But, sir, I also know that beside many thousand honest claims presented and unpaid, many thonsand are unpresented and barred by the act of March 3, 1873; and the Government now puts in the plea of a dishonest creditor, and says, "Because you waited on me so long for the money I owe you, I will not pay you at all."

Again, while I have admitted that often the prices charged for supplies is too much, I do say, and know what I say to be true, that if the commissioners had been engaged in buying supplies in my section of the country in 1863, 1864, and 1865, when the country had been impoverished by the enemy and then by our armies; the men away in the service or in prison; no transportation, except by wagons, from Lexington, Kentucky—nearly two hundred miles—over mountain roads, cut up by moving armies; at a time, too, when raids endangered every effort that was made to get supplies by these means; I say, if they had bought supplies at the actual market prices and their real value and sold at the prices they now allow, they would not have done business, even on a small scale, very long, until they could not have availed themselves of the benefits of voluntary bankruptcy.

It is now ten years since these debts were contracted; and in those ten years many of those creditors of this Government, impoverished by the war—their sons, who were their prop and support, lost in battle or in prison for their devotion to the Government—sadly needing the little money we owe them, pinched by poverty, have passed away, their last hours imbittered by feeling that the Government they so devotedly loved, and for which they suffered and endured so much, was unjust to its people and heedless of their rights.

We have two classes of creditors: One who furnished money to carry on the war, because, safe in the rear, they made money out of that war. These men received beautifully engraved bonds, with coupons attached, in which we acknowledged the debt, and promised not only to pay the principal but the interest. And so anxious to keep this obligation are we, that we often pay it—and pay it in gold—before it is due. The other class of creditors furnished supplies for your Army. Their homes were made battle-fields, their farms desolated, and their property destroyed. Your armies took their meager supplies, though their children cried for bread. This is no overdrawn picture. Has this class of the country's creditors no friends here? Let but a word be said touching the interests of that other class of the country's creditors, the bondholders, and a dozen champions spring to their feet to hurl the thunderbolts of their eloquence at the man who dares to be so rash. Does the country belong to the bondholders, while other creditors, not preferred in the mortgage they hold, have no rights which we are bound to respect?

Six years passed away, when for the first time Congress provided for the appointment of commissioners to examine the claims of these people. Two years' time only you then gave them, and then you passed the act of March 3, 1873, barring the presentation of such claims.

Permit me to mention in this connection facts which have existed in my own State. Upon the advent of the Federal Army in 1863—that Army being two hundred miles from the base of supplies, with no means of reaching them except by wagons over almost impassable mountain roads—the commanding general found the people ready to furnish supplies, ready to divide with the Army so long as they had anything to spare. There was appointed a commission of eminent gentlemen before whom claimants appeared, undergoing the trouble and expense of presenting proof of their claims. Those papers still lie there; they have never been acted upon, because the commission had no authority to pay the claims.

Again, in 1868 the Legislature of my State, thinking it best to apply through the State authorities to the national Government to meet claims that were due its citizens, passed a law appointing commissioners. The people went on and made proof of their claims. Useless expense was incurred. Our friends, the democratic party, got possession of the State, and the proofs of these claims sleep in the pigeon-holes of our capitol; and when Congress passed a law March 3, 1871, my people had no confidence that a tribunal had been constituted which would adjudicate their claims and pay them. By the time you had given them the first notice by the payment of some of these claims by the claims commissioners an act was passed which barred the presentation of all others.

Again, Mr. Speaker, this bill, in my judgment, works a direct and positive injury to thousands of the most needy and deserving of this country's creditors. They do not demand principal and interest in gold. They ask only the payment of the principal, due ten long years ago, in greenbacks. Nor will they be able, in their rural simplicity, to understand the argument of the learned gentleman from New York when he insists that this transfer will allow claims to be sooner paid; they will be unable to see that one tribunal can settle these claims and pay them more rapidly than can three now engaged in this work. Shall we bring reproach and shame upon this Government by such legislation as will longer impede and delay the payment of these claims, by transfers adding increased expense, making perhaps necessary additional proof, and the employment of claim agents, which will leave but a poor pittance of the amount which the commissioners of claims will allow? Claims for supplies furnished are often supported by vouchers. The claimants need no other proof; no petition, as is required by the commissioners. They need no attorney to look after them. They do not have to incur from seven to forty dollars fees to special commissioners to take evidence. If you transfer this class of claims to another tribunal for examination, with such jurisdiction as the act of March 3, 1871, gives the commissioners, and with the rules they have established, you render it wholly impracticable to attempt a collection of small claims.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] in his opening speech upon this subject said—I quote from his speech as reported in the RECORD—

> Seventh. This provision, if adopted, will, after the 1st day of November next, bar all further claims of this nature connected with the war; and the next annual report of the commissioners of claims will enable us to know how many of these claims are outstanding, and whether the Treasury will be equal to their payment.

Does he mean when we get them all before one tribunal—those already filed and those that may be filed within the next few months—if, after the passage of this act, they then call for a larger sum than we may find it convenient to meet, that he will favor repudiating all of them? I hope not. What principle of justice or honesty would there be in refusing to pay my constituents the small debts the Government justly owes them while you are taxing them to raise money to meet the bonds and interest of the gentlemen's constituents? No, sir. If we must repudiate any part of the debt, which I see no reason to fear, believing the Treasury will be equal to the payment of all its indebtedness, would it not be more just, cause less hardship and suffering, to repudiate any other class of our indebtedness rather than this? We can easily pay it all; and though I should regret the necessity for additional taxation, yet, sir, if, after an honest effort to so reduce the expenses of the Government that the present revenues will meet running expenses, and the public debts as they shall fall due, we should fail, and it became necessary to lay a tax on some articles now paying none, I, for one, shall prefer that remedy to a further and longer hinderance and delay of the payment of honest claimants who have for so many years waited for justice at your hands.

I yield the floor to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. LOWNDES.]

THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOWNDES. I have prepared some remarks upon the Army appropriation bill which I ask leave to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. (See Appendix.)

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

FINANCE.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I now yield the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

THE PUBLIC CREDIT DEMANDS THE ISSUE OF CONVERTIBLE BONDS.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, there are many important questions before Congress and the country at this time, but, in my judgment, the paramount question is that of the currency; and this conviction will probably excuse me for obtruding myself upon the House as frequently as I have done on days fixed for debate only. Having submitted for consideration a proposition which it is believed will, if it be adopted, have the effect of animating the industries of the country and restoring the revenues of the Government, I feel bound to meet, as well as I may, all objections to the measure.

Gentlemen speak on the subject of cheap transportation, and no gentleman on this floor feels the importance of cheap transportation more than I do. My constituents, Mr. Speaker, are a laboring and a manufacturing people. They want cheap food and cheap raw materials, together with the means of exporting their productions to those parts of the country in which they are consumed at the lowest possible rate. But they are unable to see any hope that they can have cheap transportation while our leading railroad companies are compelled to pay from 12 to 24 per cent. per annum for current loans, and to sell their bonds bearing 7 or 8 per cent. interest in gold at a large discount on their par value, as has been the case since we contracted the currency in the interest of the creditor class and the creditmongers of the world. Nor, sir, are they able to see how the Government shall aid in opening water transportation, while they themselves live in enforced idleness, and are unable to contribute to the revenues of the country by consuming taxable and dutiable goods as freely as they did when fully employed at good wages. In their own condition they recognize that of hundreds of thousands of other heads of families, and ascribe—and, in my judgment, rightly—the reduction of your revenues to the fact that, in contracting the volume of the currency to an amount inadequate to the legitimate business of the country, you have deprived the laborer of the ability to contribute to those revenues.

I have been asked upon this floor how it is that, if my bill has merit in it, all the metropolitan papers are against it; and especially those of the city of New York. I must admit that the great dailies have shown no friendship for it; that they have not laid it before their readers; that they have, as a general rule, withheld from their readers the fact that it provides that the Government should avail itself of its credit at home by issuing temporary loans at a lower rate of paper interest, not for the purpose of obtaining current revenue to meet daily expenditures, but for the purpose of redeeming 6 per cent. gold-bearing bonds.

Well, sir, while admitting that those papers are now hostile to it, my purpose in rising is to call the attention of the House to the fact that they have not all ever been so. While the New York Tribune was under the control of its distinguished founder it championed the measure. It was the argument of Horace Greeley that first forced me to entertain the proposition, and which compelled me in duty to the country to study the subject. And I may say that whatever influence I am exerting on this subject on the floor or in the country is due to the New York Tribune in its better days. In verification of this, I take that paper of November 9, 1871, and shall beg leave to read the entire article to the House. If members observe the article closely they will find that there is but one, and that an unessential point, of difference between the conclusions of Mr. Greeley at that day and the bill I have submitted. He proposed to pay the interest on three sixty-fives in gold. I propose, in order to increase the value of our greenbacks, to bring them nearer to par, and to diminish the artificial demand we have created for gold, and therefore, to put it nearer our greenbacks, to pay the interest in paper. Without further delay I proceed to read the article referred to in the New York Tribune of November 9, 1871. Surely no man will profess to doubt that this article is from the pen of Horace Greeley. It bears his ear-marks so clearly that its paternity could not be better established had the famous initials "H. G." been appended to it:

HOW TO REDUCE THE INTEREST ON THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. BOUTWELL'S plan of funding the national debt has had a pretty fair trial. True, the times have been adverse; but we have generally found them so when we needed to borrow money.

I shall emphasize the truth of the last proposition when I reach the end of the article.

The sum and substance of the Secretary's success is the funding of $200,000,000 at 5 per cent. on the payment of a bonus of 1½ per cent. to the "syndicate" of foreign bankers who have agreed to take the loan. We would not disparage this achievement, for we regard it as decidedly better than nothing. Add to the interest ($3,000,000) $1,000,000 more for the aggregate cost of printing the new bonds, advertising, explaining, and commending the loan, and the entire cost of funding the $200,000,000 at 5 per cent. for ten years is $4,000,000. It seems to us that this does not justify a hope that our $1,500,000 of instantly or presently redeemable sixes can be promptly funded even at 5 per cent.

Having given to the Secretary's efforts a hearty support throughout, we urge that a radically different plan may next have as fair a trial. Before we send another bond abroad to be hawked from banking house to banking house throughout Europe, we ask the Government to try—just earnestly try—to fund the bulk of our debt at home. We could not have sold our bonds during the dark hours of our civil war to Europe at any price, no matter how ruinous, if we had not first shown our faith in them by taking hundreds of millions of them ourselves. So now, having seen how reluctantly they take our reissues at 5 per cent., with a discount, let us show them that we stand ready to take a larger amount at a lower rate of interest at par. Here is the gist of our proposition.

Let Congress make our greenbacks fundable, at the pleasure of the holder, in bonds of $100, $1,000, and $10,000, drawing interest at the rate of one cent per day on each $100, (or 3.65 per annum,) and exchangeable into greenbacks at the pleasure of the holder. Now authorize the Treasury to purchase and extinguish our outstanding bonds so fast as it is supplied with the means of so doing by receipts for customs or otherwise, and to issue new greenbacks whenever larger amounts shall be required, every one being fundable in sums of $100, $1,000, or $10,000, as aforesaid, at the pleasure of the holder, in bonds drawing an annual interest of 3.65 in coin per annum, and these bonds exchangeable into greenbacks whenever a holder shall desire it.

The benefits of this system would be these:

1. Our greenbacks, which are now virtual falsehoods, would be truths. The Government would pay them on demand in bonds as aforesaid, which is in substantial accordance with the plan on which the greenbacks were first authorized.

2. Every person having greenbacks for which he had no present need would present them at some sub-treasury and exchange them at par for these bonds. Suppose he has $10,000 which he expects to use a month hence, he can make them earn him $30 meantime, without incurring the smallest danger of loss by bank failure or otherwise, and with a positive certainty that the money would be ready for him whenever he chose to take it.

3. A merchant leaves New York with $1,000,000 which he purposes to invest in wheat at the West or in cotton at the South. He calls at our sub-treasury, exchanges his greenbacks for these bonds, and takes or sends these to Chicago, Saint Paul, New Orleans, or Galvestion, to be exchanged for use when needed. After looking about for a month, he buys half the produce he originally intended, converts half his bonds into greenbacks, receives $50 per day, or $1,500 in all, as interest, and makes his payments. After traveling and looking for another month, he invests the remainder of his capital, receives $3,000 as interest thereon for the two months he has held the last half million of bonds, and lays his course homeward. His bonds may have lain nearly all the time he owned them in the vaults of some bank; but they were earning money, not for that bank but for him.

4. Our greenbacks, no longer false, but convertible at pleasure into bonds bearing a moderate gold interest and exchangeable as aforesaid, could not fail to appreciate steadily until they nearly reached the level of gold. Indeed, they would, unless issued too profusely, be really better than gold. Drawing a higher rate of interest than British consols, and convertible at pleasure, as these are not, they would in time obtain currency even in the Old World.

5. The trouble so inveterately borrowed by thousands with respect to "over-issues," "redundant currency," &c., would (or at least should) be hereby dispelled. If there were at any time an excess of currency it would tend to precipitate itself into the bonds aforesaid. If there should ever be a scarcity of currency, bonds would be exchanged at the Treasury for greenbacks till the want was fully supplied. Black Fridays and the locking up of greenbacks would soon be numbered with lost arts and hobgoblin terrors.

6. Though the demand for these bonds might for months be moderate, their convenience and manifest utility would soon diffuse their popularity and stimulate an ever-widening demand for them. They would be a favorite investment with guardians and trustees who should expect to be required to pay over the funds held by them at an early day, whether fixed or uncertain. They would say, "Though I might invest or deposit these funds where they would command a higher interest, I choose to place them where I know they will be safe and at hand when called for."

7. Ultimately, we believe they would become so popular that hundreds of millions of them would be absorbed at or very near the par of specie, and that with the proceeds an equal amount of our outstanding sixes might be redeemed and canceled, without advertising for loans or paying bankers to shin for us throughout Europe. The interest thus saved to our country would be an important item.

Such are the rude outlines of a plan which we did not originate, but which we heartily indorse. Why not give it a trial? We should dearly like to inform Europe that, since she seems not to want any more of our bonds at 5 per cent., we have concluded to take the balance ourselves at 3⅗.

I would like any of the New York papers of to-day to publish this article and answer its propositions seriatim, as Benjamin Franklin answered the six propositions of the board of trade of 1764, in a paper to which I invited your attention a week ago to-day.

Sir, I said I would emphasize the statement that we have generally found the times adverse when we need to borrow money. Let me do it. We recently had the proposition submitted by the Committee on Ways and Means to exchange a sixteen-year gold 5 per cent. loan, which was to mature on the 1st of January, 1874, for twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds; and we, in order to promote the exchange, gave the parties holding the old bonds the benefit of one month's interest. When the measure was under consideration I appealed to the House to pay the bonds, and save the payment of $20,000,000 of gold interest in quarterly payments, upon which the interest compounded would be nearly $20,000,000 more. I made the appeal in order to save us from these payments, and from a continuing debt of $20,000,000 of gold at the end of the twenty years, and all these payments. I was not heard. It was said these bonds will all be exchanged; the Treasury cannot afford to pay them; and our credit is so good that the holders of these bonds will agree to exchange them for the new series of five-twenty bonds. The very announcement, sir, that we were too poor to pay a loan of £4,000,000 sterling at maturity, sent down our credit so that, according to the Tribune of yesterday, we have already redeemed, paid in gold, $5,458,000 of them. And there are nearly $6,000,000 of them still outstanding, that may come in for redemption. Under the heading "The Treasury and the Syndicate," in discussing figures not involved in the point before us, the Tribune of yesterday says:

The difference arises from operations on the $20,000,000 loan of 1858, which became payable January 1, 1874. Of this loan as it enters into the debt statement of the 1st instant, $995,000 were registered bonds, still drawing interest; $7,828,000 had been converted into 5 per cent. bonds of the funded loan; $5,458,000 had been redeemed in gold; and $5,719,000 were entered as bonds on which interest had ceased, but which had not been presented for payment.

Now, sir, we again find ourselves in the humiliating position of having to implore the credit and money mongers of Europe to carry us through a crisis. Is it a natural or an artificial necessity? Sir, there sits upon this floor to-day one president of a corporation that would lend the Government $2,000,000 on the first day that it was ready to issue three sixty-five per cent. convertible bonds. I am the center of a large correspondence on this subject, and I state on abundant information that there are from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000 of credit ready for the Government whenever it will receive it from our own people on temporary loan at 3.65 per cent. in paper.

Now, it may be asked why would they lend at that rate when you have just shown that others refuse to lend even the Government at 5 per cent. gold? Sir, these institutions and the merchants and other holders of the funds referred to do not want to make twenty years' investment. They do not want to speculate in funded debts. They want to keep their balances safe, where they know they can get them when they call for them. They have been scorched and blistered by putting them in banks or with bankers; they want to put them with the Government. And I say it will be difficult for members of this Congress to answer their constituents, when they shall, as they will, ask them to show—I reiterate it, when they ask them to show how they find it more patriotic and more economical to employ syndicates to buy credit at 5 per cent. in gold, than to accept the funds of the American people freely offered them at 3.65 per cent. in greenbacks.

MANUFACTURE OF PATENTED ARTICLES.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of this House to a field of legislation which I believe has never yet been occupied. I believe it is of such commanding importance, to be fraught with so much that affects the welfare of the entire people, that it ought to be occupied at once. On the 20th of January last I introduced a bill having in view the regulation of a large class of interests that it appeared to me ought to be regulated by act of Congress. The number of the bill is 1392, and I suppose members will find it upon their files.

Before calling attention to the provisions of the bill, I wish to preface by remarking that the only absolute monopoly in this country is the manufacture of articles protected by letters-patent. There is no other interest in this country that is so absolutely and perfectly a monopoly as this. A man who has a patent-right, or a company or association which has a patent-right, upon an important subject, are made lords of all they survey in this country; and there is no possible way of restraining their desire to wrench from the labor of the country the largest possible percentage.

The first section of my bill provides that where a machine or other article is manufactured or compounded by virtue of a single patent, it may be manufactured, used, or sold by any person, whether in his individual or associated capacity, by payment of a royalty to the owner of the patent-right of 10 per cent. upon the market value of the article manufactured; and that he shall protect the owner of the patent-right by filing in the Patent Office a bond in the sum of $10,000, conditioned upon the accounting every six months for this royalty and the payment thereof. He is also to give notice through the Patent Office of his name, place of residence, and place of business.

The second section provides that wherever any article or machine has in its construction or composition an improvement protected by letters-patent, or where it is constructed or compounded under and by virtue of a combination or consolidation of two or more patents, then any person, in his individual or associated capacity, may go into the United States district court in the district where the owners of those patents or the majority of them may reside, and by proceedings such as are now provided in civil causes therein have the royalty determined by the court; and that this first proceeding shall be at the cost of the applicant, he protecting the owners of the patent by a bond, as I have before indicated. And it being not altogether impossible that the first adjustment of the royalty would be inadequate or unjust, the bill further provides that in the event it is desirable, the owners of the patent, on thirty days' notice, may have a readjustment of the royalty, and that that readjustment shall be at their own cost, and final. The same provision applies to copyrights.

I ask the attention of the House now for a brief time to some statistics going to illustrate the justice, the propriety, and, in my judgment, the absolute necessity of legislation of this character. The statistics that I have gathered are mainly from the returns of the last census. In 1870 there were $2,118,208,789 of capital engaged in all classes of manufacture, whether protected by patents or otherwise. By the expenditure of a little over $775,000,000 for labor, and nearly $2,500,000,000 for material, there was produced an aggregate product of $4,232,000,000. The net product, deducting from this aggregate the wages paid and the cost of the material furnished, was 40 per cent. upon the capital employed. This is not the absolute net profit, but it approximates to it; and I have used it as the basis throughout.

Take tanned leather. In this branch of industry, $42,720,505 of capital brought in as net product 35 per cent.—less than the average; so that it would require a fraction over thirty-four months to make up the entire amount paid for wages, materials, and capital.

Woolen goods produced 32 per cent. upon a like basis. Pig-iron produced upon a like basis 20 per cent. and a fraction. Cotton goods upon the same basis produced 18 per cent. and a fraction. These goods are as nearly free from the influence of patent rights as any that I could find aggregating any considerable capital.

I ask attention now for a little while to some of the industries specially protected by patent rights.

First, patent medicine and compounds employed $6,667,684 of capital; and upon the same basis netted 118 per cent. I am not complaining of that so very much in view of the questionable character of many of the products so eagerly bought throughout the country.

In India rubber and elastic goods the capital employed was $7,486,600; the wages paid amounted to $2,559,877; the materials cost $7,434,742. The product was $14,566,370; and the percentage was 59 per cent. upon the capital employed. Suppose we were to apply the provisions of his bill to this one class of goods; suppose that we had had legislation of this character three years ago in the State of Indiana, (and I presume the case is the same throughout the country,) there would have been a vast amount of most vexatious and expensive litigation saved to a very creditable profession in this country. A large number of dentists in the State of Indiana—more than two hundred, I believe—were compelled to pay to the owners of the hard-rubber patent from $150 to $300 apiece to compromise suits brought against them for infringement. If the provisions of this bill had been in force the dentists in one county, or two or three or four counties, could have banded together, formed an association, given their bond, issued their notices, and then used this material in their business, paying to the owners of the patents 10 per cent. upon the value of the materials used—in no event to be less than twenty-five cents upon a single article. Under such a provision the owners of the patents themselves would have reaped a rich harvest, the dental profession would have been greatly benefited, the entire community would have received the benefit, and all interested would have been at peace, instead of being dragged from the uttermost corners of the State to the capital of the Commonwealth at great expense to answer to the demand for blood from the owners of these patents.

I turn next to house-organs and materials. The capital employed in the manufacture of these was $1,775,850, producing a net product of 61 per cent. You who have paid $161 for a house-organ have on that basis given to the owners of the patent a net profit of $61 on the organ. Shall music be so dear when the human breast wants it so much?

I next refer to sewing-machines. The capital invested in sewing-machines, as shown by the census, was a little over $8,750,000; the wages paid, a fraction over $5,000,000; the cost of the materials, a fraction over $3,000,000; and the net product was 67 per cent. of the capital. It takes but a fraction over seventeen months for the sewing-machine capital of this country to pay for all the labor it employs, all the materials it uses, and all the capital that is engaged in the business. Every two years you might burn down or utterly destroy every sewing-machine establishment in this country, and they would yet have in their pockets all that they had paid for wages and materials—all their capital, and in the neighborhood of 20 per cent. beside. In 1871, 610,000 sewing-machines were manufactured by twenty-five companies in this country. Averaging these sewing-machines at sixty dollars apiece, (and surely this is a low average,) we have an aggregate product of $36,600,000; leaving them upon this basis $14,683,833 actual profit. The profit upon a sixty-dollar machine, as shown by the census of 1870, is twenty-four dollars—a very handsome investment. The entire number of sewing-machines sold in the United States up to the present time reaches in the neighborhood of three million five hundred thousand; and the aggregate profit on this basis upon the sewing-machines throughout the land amounts to $84,250,000; and the great proportion of it comes from the toilers by the midnight lamp; the greater portion of it comes from those who are compelled to "stitch, stitch, stitch," for a meager subsistence, while the patent-holders are insisting that $24 out of every $60 that they invest in sewing-machines shall go to them as profit.

Agricultural implements: The capital employed in the manufacture of these in 1870, as shown by the census, was $34,834,600. They paid a little over $12,600,000 for wages; they paid nearly $21,500,000 for materials; and their net profits on the basis indicated, was 52 per cent. on all the agricultural implements and machinery in the country. The man who pays $150 for his reaper pays $52 as a royalty to-day to the holders of patent-rights. The patent-rights are to be found upon the farm, upon every agricultural implement and machine, unless it may possibly be the old split pitchfork and the old-style rake. It is 52 per cent. on every dollar invested in the manufacture of agricultural implements and machinery clear profit. The aggregate amount in 1870 of this class of property in the United States was a fraction over $333,000,000. The actual profit upon that was nearly $120,000,000.

Taking the two items of sewing-machines and agricultural implements, and the aggregate profit on all that have been sold, from their introduction up to the present time on sewing-machines, and up to 1870 on agricultural implements, is over $200,000,000 of actual profit—clean cut—thick cut, it is true, but clean cut.

Here are now five branches of industry peculiarly protected by patent-rights. The aggregate capital invested in these five branches was a fraction over fifty-nine and a half millions of dollars. That capital produced $37,823,820 of net profits; $59,000,000 produce $37,000,000 net profit. The same amount of capital, or nearly so, invested in manufacturing pig-iron ($53,000,000) produced eleven and two-thirds millions of dollars, less than one-third of the net profit of these five patent-right articles. The same amount of capital invested in cotton goods produced about $10,000,000—almost or nearly one-fourth as much as was produced by patent-right articles.

Look at it further. Fifty-nine million dollars constituted one thirty-fifth of the entire capital invested in manufactures in 1870. This one thirty-fifth of the manufacturing capital of the country produced one twenty-second of the net aggregate profits. In any way you may look at it you will find there is a duplication every two years. You may burn up and utterly destroy every agricultural-implement manufacturing establishment in the country, and they will yet make 4 per cent. on the invested amount. How many farmers of the country would be glad if they could do near so well? Thirty-five millions of capital invested in agricultural implements doubles itself every two years, and leaves a net profit besides. So it goes on, and on, and on, until, when the ordinary life of a patent-right shall have expired, more than $400,000,000 has been made, or nearly made, by the original $35,000,000. To illustrate it: here is a farmer, a young man, who has forty acres of land; he works that forty acres of land year in and year out, and in two years he makes the adjoining forty acres; at the end of the fourth year another forty acres; at the end of six years another forty acres; so that at the end of seventeen years, the ordinary life of a patent, the original forty acres, working nothing else, would have made for him two hundred and eighty acres. Almost any farmer in this broad land would be glad of such an opportunity to provide for his old age and children.

I have no animosity against these patent-rights. I look upon the protection of inventive genius and enterprising capital as one of the greatest influences in developing the material resources of the country. I have no interest whatever in breaking them down. I prefer to encourage, I prefer to strengthen them, but in encouraging and strengthening I do not wish to warm in my bosom the serpent which will turn on me and sting me to death; that will paralyze the hand which has supplied it with the means of life.

Objections are urged to this kind of legislation upon different grounds; but before passing to those objections I desire to appeal to any man here whether if the commercial community of this country could make 10 per cent. net upon its sales it would not be amply satisfied; whether in every other department of labor a net profit of 10 per cent. is not considered a handsome return. Here we have it beyond the 50, beyond the 60, beyond the 100; and all because we have pursued a policy in the country which has given them the absolute control of all the resources of the country.

It is said that such legislation ought not to be considered, because the inventive genius of the country ought to be encouraged. This bill does encourage the inventive genius. It puts into the hands of the inventor his own invention. It gives him the opportunity to interest capital all over the country. It develops his invention wherever it is brought to the attention of the public. As it is now, the inventor of a useful machine or a useful commodity is crushed by vexatious litigation and by untoward influences that are brought to bear by the capital of the country. I appeal to the members of this House, whether nine-tenths of those who have come here now and heretofore for the extension of patents have not said invariably that they have been subjected to such vexations and expensive litigation and such untoward influences from capital that they have been unable themselves to make anything out of their inventions; they have had to buffet and battle, and finally had their hopes crushed out of them, while the capital that has secured the patent has made warm its nest.

It is said further that we ought not to contemplate such legislation, because the right of property is as absolute in a patent-right as in money and ought not to be interfered with. I concede that the right of property in a patent is an actual right that ought to be protected. But it does not follow that we cannot regulate its protection. It was said to me not long since by a prominent gentleman engaged in manufacturing patented articles: "Why, sir, is not my patent-right just as much property to me for the length of time the laws of Congress have granted me the right as $50,000 in money is to you?" My answer was this: "Undoubtedly; but, my dear sir, while I may do as I please with my $50,000 in investing it in manufacturing or commercial pursuits, or in farming, yet when I come to loan it out for other people to use, the laws of every State and of Congress say to me, 'You shall not go beyond a certain per cent. of interest.' They put the bit in my mouth in regard to the use of my $50,000; and so, my dear sir, I would put the bit in your mouth on your capital. You may do as you please with it as long as you use it yourself, but when you charge the community an exorbitant and extortionate price for the use of it I will put a check on you if possible." And if it is not put on in this way there will be a power, sooner or later, that will come to these Halls and will strike out from our statutes every vestige of patent-right law and let inventors do as best they may.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Is it not a constitutional right which these men have to protection?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I am going to call the attention of the House to that. It is the next objection to which I was intending to allude.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I would ask the gentleman, also, is not that right exclusive?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I will answer that question as best I can. The objection is brought up that this is a constitutional right that cannot be interfered with in the way proposed by this bill. The provision of the Constitution on this subject in article 1, section 8, is as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

This is the constitutional provision. I will dispose of it in a summary way, which is at least satisfactory to my own mind. This is the aggregate power of Congress on this subject. It is the extent to which it can go. The different grades are not marked out in the Constitution, but the limit is given. I take it that no man upon this floor will undertake to deny that it is not competent for Congress to repeal all law on the subject of patent-rights; and in that case I ask what remedy would the owners of patent-rights have for an infringement or the use of their patents?

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. When the Constitution grants a right or a privilege, is it not imperative on Congress to execute it by law, or to provide the means for its execution?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. If the power in Congress is made mandatory the position of my friend is correct. But this is a permissive power. Congress shall have the power to do a certain thing; and if it has the power to do a certain thing it may utterly refuse to exercise that power. We have provisions of the Constitution which have never been executed by legislation.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to ask the gentleman one question, for information merely. While Congress may fail to exercise its power in the premises, and neglects to do anything, can it go to the length of passing a law which would be unconstitutional? If it does anything, must it not comply with the provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I understand the question of the gentleman from Illinois. It is a question which has been propounded to me time and again, and I shall be glad to give my views on it. The point is, if Congress exercises its powers, it must exercise them to the full limit.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Not to the full limit; but in the manner specified.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I have this to say in answer to the gentleman's question, that if Congress has the power in the first place to grant an exclusive right of manufacture for a given time on the one hand, and the constitutional power on the other hand to absolutely wipe out all legislation upon the subject, that these two extreme points are not the only points at which the act of Congress may rest. The greater includes the less. If we can absolutely destroy this property we may preserve a part of it. If we can absolutely take away from these men all rights, we may compromise with them and leave them some rights.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in regard to the wording of his bill. If Congress proposes to carry out the provision of the Constitution which has been read, must it not do so in the way the Constitution provides? The gentleman's bill provides that anybody may use this patent by paying 10 per cent. Does not the Constitution give the parties the right of assigning to some persons and not to others?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. The word "exclusive" means that. But it means more. It may be exclusive within limits; it may be exclusive within certain prescribed limitations. And within the 10 per cent. provided here, and within the royalty that is determined by the court, the power to manufacture is exclusive. I have simply to say upon this power of the Constitution, that I shall regret the day when a majority in Congress shall say that we have provided a Constitution and laws under which we shall create in our midst a class, a moneyed aristocracy that may feed upon the vitals of the country until it is satiated, without shame and without restraint; and still that we cannot raise our hands against the foul bird that is preying upon us. Shall it be said that this, the creature of our own hands, may turn on us, and, by construction, eat up our substance? Is that the sort of construction that would prevail in any court in the land? Or, rather, would there not be such a construction as was intended by the framers of the Constitution, and by the clear intendment of the law, taken in connection with the development of the art and science of government at the time the construction is made? Shall we put upon ourselves a strait-jacket, and say that this exclusive privilege shall be construed either that we shall give to these companies or corporations a further power, a power that nobody else in this country can exercise, or else that we shall refuse it at all? Sir, if the advocates of the owners of these patents throw down that gauntlet, I will take it up and go to the country and say, "Since you will not go upon fair and reasonable grounds, you shall go without relief, without any kind of protection; if you insist upon destroying our substance, we will, in self-defense, turn on you and destroy you."

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Would you not thereby violate the Constitution?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. Not by any means. This is a permissive power, and the repeal of the patent-right law would be no violation of the Constitution whatever. I have never yet heard any man, professional, practicing lawyer or statesman, take the ground that Congress could not repeal an act that it had passed; probably the rights created by that act would be reserved.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Would it be wise, provided Congress had the right, to exercise the right to repeal the patent laws?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I do not think it would be.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I think that nothing has tended so much to develop the agricultural resources of this country as the genius that has been displayed in the invention and manufacture of agricultural tools. The people who use them are at perfect liberty to avail themselves of the skill of the inventor or not, as they choose. If they choose, they can go back to the old primitive articles of manufacture.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. That is very much like saying to poor Jack, "Why don't you eat your supper?" At the same time he had no supper to eat. These primitive modes of agriculture have passed away. The necessities of the times have made these improved agricultural machines absolutely necessary. Had the gentleman listened to me awhile ago he would have heard that I had no animosity to inventive genius; that I thought it ought to be encouraged, and developed, and protected. But when it turns upon its protector, and says to its creator, "Give me your blood and substance to the last," then I will meet it and say, "You are my creature; down! If you will not confine yourself within reasonable limits, then we will bring our power to bear upon you to its fullest extent."

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Has not the Constitution provided for a remedy by saying that this right may be protected for a limited time, so that you may give it a limited right, for one year for instance, and then throw it open to the public? And by using the word "exclusive" does not the Constitution intend to give the inventor the absolute control for so long a time as Congress in its wisdom may see proper to limit that control?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I do not think so. We may limit it to one year, it is true. Suppose we were to submit this question to the patent owners, "Will you take your patent-right for a year or 10 per cent. royalty for seventeen years?" what would be the answer?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I do not say that would not be the best way. But I ask, is not Congress restricted under the Constitution to giving an exclusive proprietorship to the inventor, and the controlling him by limiting the time for which he is to have that exclusive proprietorship?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I understand the gentleman, but I prefer my mode to his on constitutional grounds. But there is another element in this matter that is worthy of all consideration, worthy of all acceptation. There is no one thing to-day which is bringing the Government of the United States more into contempt and reproach among its own citizens than the swindling that is carried on in the sale of territory of patent-rights. Most villainous has been its practice throughout the country. As a rule, you find that no good patent-right is on the market peddling itself out in that way. A good patent-right is too good a property to be used in that way. An invention which is of value, and will pay from 50 to 100 per cent. upon the capital used, will not be put out in that way. But the worthless patents are carried through the country by designing men, and sold; they go through the country with a great sheet of parchment, handsomely embellished with a picture of the Patent Office, beautifully executed, written in an elegant hand, with the great seal of the Patent Office attached. And they say, "Look here; the United States has had this matter before scientific men, and they say it is worth a great deal." And simple people, and often those who are not simple, are got into such a situation that they cannot restrain themselves, and they will buy. I know one town in my own State where these designing men took $33,500 for one of these worthless patents. All these designing men who have patents that are not worth a last year's robin's nest go out under the cloak of the authority of the Government with a patent-right, and swindle the people out of their substance.

Mr. SPEER. I would like to put a question to the gentleman. I am ready to join with him in denouncing the swindling patent-right men who travel over the country; but as a practical question, what remedy does the gentleman propose?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I propose to apply a remedy by this bill, (H. R. No. 1392.) By this measure I would take away from everybody the opportunity of making such immense profits out of patent-rights; I would say to them that there shall be no more than 10 per cent. royalty in any patent. Thus I would take away the inducement to these extortionate profits; I would remove the exciting cause of this cupidity.

Mr. SPEER. Would not the gentleman have to go a step further and legislate brains into the people to prevent them from being swindled?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I do not propose to do that. I propose to take away from these designing men the means of making exorbitant profits out of that which derives its value from the official authority of the Government. If then the people have not brains enough to protect themselves they will have to suffer. As suggested by my colleague, [Mr. SHANKS,] the essential element of value in a patent comes from the fact that it has been examined by the scientific departments of the Government, and has the sanction of the United States, giving an exclusive right to the patentee. In a vast majority of cases that is the only element of value, and it is utterly fictitious. I would take it away.

Why, sir, throughout the West, traveling along the highways, you will see here and there upon the gate-posts a notice posted up: "Patent-right men not allowed on these premises." Why is this? These men have the authority of the Government of the United States; they have the parchment of this Government attested by its seal; why can they not be allowed upon the premises of the people the same as any other honest man? Because there has gathered about this subject so much contempt, and the Government itself is brought into such odium. Let us wipe out these oppressive monopolies. Let us make fair terms with inventive genius and enterprising capital. Let us pay whatever is right and proper in consideration of inventive genius and the intrepidity and enterprise of capital. Let us say, "For all the energy that you display you shall have a sufficient reward in the way of absolute monopoly to yield you 10 per cent." If 10 per cent. is not enough, make it 15; if 10 per cent. is too much, make it 5. But let us put an end to this oppressive system of patent-rights, which runs riot throughout the land, trampling every green thing into the dust.

Mr. Speaker, I entreat for this subject the consideration to which it is entitled. Yearly hundreds of millions of extortionate profits are gathered into the coffers of the few. Give me the Goodyear patent, give me almost any patent that is now in general use, and I shall ask no more than 5 or 10 per cent. royalty. Why, sir, a royalty of 10 per cent. upon these various articles in common use would give to the owners of the patent-rights a princely income; it would make them an order of purple and fine linen sufficiently conspicuous to answer all the purposes of a republic like ours.

I ask, then, that when this subject shall come before the House, there may be such action upon it as will satisfy the country that this Congress is not only willing but ready to grapple with the greatest monopoly of the age in the interest of the oppressed people.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I would like the gentleman to make one explanation. Does not his bill provide that any manufacturer, by paying 10 per cent., may use a patent; and would not this give to the capitalist an advantage over the man of small means?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. The patentee gets his royalty from the rich man who manufactures.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Does not that rich man get all the profit?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. No, sir; I think it will be found that if he makes more than 10 per cent. above the royalty upon the patent, competition will restrain him, as is the case in other departments of manufacture.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to ask my colleague whether it is a fact that the Post-Office Department pays a royalty of two dollars on each of the letter-boxes which we see upon lamp-posts in the different cities where the system of delivery by carriers is in operation? I understand that upon each of those boxes two dollars royalty is paid to some one holding a patent. So that whenever we extend the letter-carrier system we impose upon the United States an additional liability to pay two dollars royalty upon all the letter-boxes that may be found necessary in the extension of the system.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I understand that to be a fact, though I am not authoritatively informed upon the point from any official source.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CROSSLAND. Mr Speaker, I have sought the floor to-day to offer a few words of earnest protest against restoring the franking privilege. In my first canvass for Congress, one of my competitors, better informed on the subject than I was, brought the question into the canvass, spoke of the abuses that were perpetrated under it, the immense expense it entailed on the people, and announced his intention, if elected, to vote to abolish it. When I entered the Forty-second Congress I determined to investigate the subject, and, referring to the report of the Postmaster-General for 1867-'68, I read as follows:

> I am compelled again to call attention to the gross frauds perpetrated upon the Department by violation of the franking privilege in almost all parts of the country. The fac simile franks of different members of Congress are freely used to circulate obscene books and papers, lottery circulars, business cards, &c., and to cover all kinds of business and domestic correspondence of persons not authorized by law to frank mailable matter. Unless something is done speedily by Congress to check this serious mischief the annual appropriation to cover the transmission of free matter will have to be increased from $700,000 to at least $1,000,000.

In the report for 1868-'69 he says:

> I have had occasion frequently during the past year to call the attention of members of Congress to the use of their names in sending mailable matter free under a fac simile frank; and the use of it by claim agents and business men in cities in sending books, periodicals, letters, and business circulars defrauds the Department out of immense sums of money. It is estimated that the loss to the Department by this species of abuse of the franking privilege has amounted to from one million to one million and a half of dollars during the past year.

In the report for 1870-'71 he again urges the repeal:

> My anxiety to make the Department self-sustaining arises from a strong desire to reduce, equalize, and make uniform the rates of postage. During the year 1870 the amount derived from letter postage was $16,771,928.70, and the amount from newspapers and pamphlets was only $934,332.99; and yet the weight and bulk of newspaper mails are, at least nine out of ten times, greater than those of letter mails. This shows that while newspapers are charged much less than the cost of their transmission, letters are charged much more, and that the postage on letters should in fairness be reduced as soon as the finances of the Department will permit. If letter postage could be reduced from three to two cents I am sure that the increased correspondence thereby stimulated would in a few years compensate for any temporary loss of revenue, and that many mistakes and vexatious delays would be avoided by the uniform rate for all distances which would thus be established. I despair, however, of securing any further reduction of letter postage as long as the franking privilege shall be permitted to impose upon the Department an irremediable deficiency.
> It is not intended to intimate that there should be an increase of postage on newspapers. On the contrary, it is the duty of Government, as part of its work of beneficence, to aid in the education and elevation of the people by carrying newspapers as cheaply as possible; and hence I am of opinion that the present rates are not too low. Nor do I object to the free transportation of newspapers in the counties of their publication, as now authorized by law.

In the report for 1871-'72, he states:

> Again, I renew my recommendation for the repeal of the franking privilege. Its existence is utterly incompatible with an economical and vigorous administration of postal affairs. Flagrant frauds have been practiced during the past year, and will continue to be practiced under its cover so long as the privilege is protected by law. I refer to my arguments on this subject in former reports, with unshaken confidence in their soundness.

In the report of 1872-'73 he again urges it, and states the enormous amount it costs the people:

> In my three previous reports I have urgently recommended the immediate and unconditional repeal of the franking privilege. The experience of the past year has strengthened my conviction that its abolition is absolutely necessary to an efficient, economical, and vigorous administration of our postal system.
> By reference to a special report made to Congress on the 12th of January, 1871, it will appear that the actual cost of free matter, if charged with the regular rates of postage, was then $2,543,327.72 annually. During the late presidential canvass the quantity of such matter was largely increased, and I think it safe to say that the free matter carried during the past year, if taxed at ordinary rates, would have yielded a revenue of $3,500,000, a sum larger than the entire deficiency of the year.

The estimate of the Postmaster-General had been freely questioned and his recommendations disregarded, for the reason that his estimate of the expenses was denied. By reference to Senate documents for 1870-'71 the plan adopted by him to procure the information will be found. In 1869 he sent to each postmaster in the United States the order following:

> FREE MAIL MATTER.
> POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
> OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
> Washington, D. C., December 17, 1869.
> To Postmasters:
>
> The Postmaster- General has this day made the following order:
>
> Ordered, That each postmaster in the United States be instructed to take an accurate monthly account of all franked or free matter deposited at their respective offices for mailing for the period of six months, commencing January 1 and ending June 30, 1870; and to make special reports thereof to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General at the close of each month, embracing the following particulars, namely:
> 1. The number of franked or free letters, and the amount of postage that would be chargeable thereon at the established rate of postage.
> 2. The weight of franked or free matter other than letters, and the amount that would be chargeable thereon at the current rates of postage.
>
> Postmasters will carefully conform to the foregoing instructions, using the inclosed form, which must be promptly forwarded to this office at the close of each month.
>
> Should this circular fail to be received at any post-office in time to commence taking an account of free matter on the 1st of January, 1870, let the return for that month include such portion of the month as may remain when the circular is received.
> By order of the Postmaster-General:
>
> W. H. H. TERRELL,
> Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

And after receiving the returns he proceeded to make the calculation and estimate, which show as follows:

> From the above returns and estimates the following grand result is shown: Total number of franked letters for six months, 10,894,497—postage, $933,070; printed matter, &c., 2,655,196 pounds—postage, $338,593,85. Total postage for six months, $1,271,663.86; total for one year, $2,543,327.72.

Now, Mr. Speaker, could there have been a better plan adopted to obtain perfectly correct and reliable evidence on the subject? No man can suggest a better one, nor can any man offer any fact to dispute the correctness and accuracy of the estimate. After examining these reports, estimates, and evidences, showing the abuses and frauds committed and the vast cost of this privilege, I came to the conclusion that it ought to be abolished, and some cheaper and less expensive means devised whereby we could send our books, documents, seeds, &c., to our constituents. A bill was pending for the abolition of the privilege, and when it was brought before the House at the second session I voted for it. The Senate failed to concur during that session. At the last session the subject was referred to the Judiciary Committee of this House, connected with questions of other privileges and salaries of members of Congress, and the committee having before them the estimate of the Postmaster-General showing this enormous expense, and having evidence showing the inequalities and abuses of other perquisites and privileges of members of Congress, determined that it would be better to abolish all these expensive privileges. The mileage was unequal, made the salaries of some members almost double that received by others, and was unjust and unnecessary; the stationery allowance was far beyond what was necessary to supply such articles as were used; and the committee in their report strongly urged the discontinuance of these privileges and in lieu of them to increase the salaries of members of Congress. Before the salary bill was brought before the House a bill passed abolishing the franking privilege, and I did not vote for the salary bill, because the law repealing the franking privilege contained a provision forbidding any allowance to members of Congress to pay postage, and I did not think it would look honest or candid to abolish the franking privilege in the name of economy and immediately raise salaries. Nor did I vote for the salary bill until it was made part of the legislative, judicial, and executive appropriation bill, and not even then until after the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] providing for suits to recover from the Credit Mobilier Company millions of dollars justly due to the Government and the people had been adopted. And I never did vote for the salary bill until the question was presented by the report of the committee of conference, when I had but one vote on the whole bill, and was obliged to vote yes or no on the bill, the whole bill good and bad, and voted ay because the little addition to the expenses of the Government by increase of salaries sunk into such insignificance when contrasted with the immense sum saved by other provisions of the bill. And here I will say that much of the abuse that has been hurled at those who voted for that bill came from the friends of this Credit Mobilier, because the bill took their hands out of the Treasury and directed the recovery from them of the immense sums they had stolen from the people.

But, Mr. Speaker, I knew at that time that it was best for the tax-payers to increase the salaries and abolish these perquisites; because, as I have said, a large sum of money would be annually saved to them by it. And when the friends of economy, as they called themselves, offered bills to reduce salaries and revive these perquisites, I opposed them all, because, as I said in a speech on the 12th of January, it was apparent that it was the purpose of these same friends of economy to revive all these unnecessary and expensive privileges. And when the bill returned from the Senate, these gentlemen voted to revive the mileage and stationery, newspaper allowance, &c., and now we are called on to revive this most odious and expensive franking privilege. Now, sir, I propose to expose this barefaced effort to deceive the people.

As I have shown, sir, the Postmaster-General proves that this franking privilege imposes on the tax-payers of this country an annual expense of $2,543,327; and he says that for the year 1872 it amounted to $3,500,000; the millions upon millions of documents sent through the mails during the presidential canvass of that year increasing the annual amount over $1,000,000. Now, sir, if it amounts to $2,543,327 every year, and three and a half millions every fourth year, it will average every year the sum of $2,782,492. Add for stationery for members of Congress, $47,000; add to pay mileage of members of Congress, $203,800; and we see that the three perquisites cost $3,036,292 every year.

The expense incurred by increasing the salaries of members of Congress is only $940,000 a year; increase of salaries of other officers, $57,500; which makes $997,500. The franking privilege, stationery, and mileage allowances cost per annum, $3,036,292. Subtract amount of increase of salaries, $997,500, and we have the sum of $2,038,792 saved to the Government and the people every year by the laws passed last session of Congress which abolished these costly perquisites and increased the salaries. Now, further to verify and establish the facts, I refer to the report of the Postmaster-General, made to Congress at the beginning of the third session of the Forty-second Congress, one year ago last December. He tells us that the total expenditure of the Post-Office Department for a year was $30,863,167; that the deficiency, to be raised by taxing the people, for that year would be $3,310,602. In the report made at the beginning of this Congress, on the first Monday of last December, he says that the total expenditure for the year was $33,929,912, but that the deficiency was only $4,636,363.

The franking privilege did not expire until the 1st day of last July, yet we see that in less than six months this deficiency is reduced $1,674,239, or at the rate of $2,348,578 a year, which proves conclusively that the savings to the people are greater than the amount claimed by the Postmaster-General. To promote economy, as gentlemen called it, they reduced salaries of members of Congress and saved $940,000 a year; they revive these perquisites and increase expenses $3,036,292. They go home to the people, abuse "salary-grabbers;" boast of the part they played in repealing the salary act, and of the economy they enforced. What estimate do you put on the common sense of the people when you offer them this system of economy? You have, every one of you, (I mean the salary-shriekers,) voted to restore the iniquitous mileage allowance and the unjust stationery allowance. Now vote for this and then ever utter the word "economy" again. Do not attempt to avoid the effect of the figures by arguing that you are only reviving the franking privilege in a modified form. You do not revive it as to letters written by members. It is not the letters that make the costs, but the thousands of tons of books, documents, and pamphlets sent out every year, that created the expense, and it was this book-franking that caused all the frauds the Postmaster-General complains of. Publishing houses, book agents, claim agents, and others used "franks," either with or without the consent of the members, to send their business circulars, documents, and books through the mail without cost.

As stated in the report I read, the Postmaster-General desires to reduce postage on letters and newspapers; but it never can be done if you revive this franking privilege and run up the deficiency, to be raised by taxation, to more than $6,000,000 a year, as it was before the privilege was abolished. A provision has been incorporated in this bill, very ingeniously, to repeal so much of the postal law as requires the payment of postage on newspapers in the county where published and on newspaper exchanges. I am in favor of that. No revenue of any consequence is derived from it. It is troublesome to newspaper publishers and the people, and amounts to nothing in revenues or expenses. The passage of such a law was never asked for by the Department, and it ought to be repealed. I will vote to repeal it; but I will not vote for this bill and revive the enormous expenses it involves to get this provision passed. It seems to me it was put in to popularize this otherwise bad measure. Let us separate them, and enact the good and leave out the bad part.

Gentlemen, you have said by your votes (I mean these extremely virtuous and economical salary-shriekers) that you have received since the 4th day of last March $208 per month more than you were entitled to, and you have reduced your salary and mine to that extent. You have received, then, of this excess the sum of $2,184. Now use this excess in paying your postage on the books, documents, seeds, &c., furnished you for your constituents; let this, to the people, burdensome privilege alone, and prevent the revival of the outrageous frauds practiced under it. If you are unwilling to do this, take a manly, candid view of the facts, look the figures and the truth square in the face. Abolish mileage, buy and pay for your stationery, pay your postage, and fix your salaries at a sum sufficient to meet these expenses, and the people will understand you. These perquisites are as much a part of your salaries as the $5,000 you draw from the Treasury; and it is not a very ingenious complication you present to the people when you, under the pretense of reducing salaries from $7,500 a year to $5,000, give yourselves $5,000 a year salary and privileges worth to you fully $2,500 a year, and which cost the people more than $5,000 for each of you.

Mr. Speaker, in this matter of salaries and perquisites I have sought to act in good faith; and I ask, gentlemen, if you are the real, earnest friends of economy that you pretend you are, can you dispute the figures I have arrayed? I invite you to do it; yea, I defy you to do it. If you cannot, and mean to act fairly, candidly, and in good faith by the interest of the people, come and stand with me and help me to defeat this great iniquity. Remember, gentlemen, that the self-abnegation you imposed by reducing the salaries will not avail you if you reimburse yourself by re-establishing these costly privileges.

FINANCE.

Mr. BECK. I am obliged to my colleague [Mr. CROSSLAND] for his courtesy in yielding to me for a few minutes. I see that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is still in the House. I had not intended to say anything except that, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania had the floor, it occurred to me that he was practicing the maxim of the very distinguished gentleman who was so long Senator from Missouri, Mr. Benton, who was in the habit of saying that the finest figure of speech in the English language is "ding-dong." The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been ding-donging us for the last four Saturdays on his currency bill, until I do not know what relief we will get from him unless we refuse to hold Saturday meetings altogether. [Laughter.] I do not want to do that if I can possibly help it. I would only say to the gentleman that unless he can spare other members a little and let us alone for one Saturday with his theories about currency, we will, in self-protection, have to vote against having the Saturday meetings any more.

Being up, I want to say this also: that while it is very important to be considering the currency question, I think the country ought to understand that there is away beyond that, and underlying that, a question far more important, which, perhaps, the gentleman and those who feel as he does do not want the country or the House to look into. I sometimes think that he is endeavoring by getting up a great excitement over the question of banking and currency to keep the question of tariff taxation from being examined into. I am inclined to think that the gentleman will find, when he goes to the bottom of it, the country will learn after awhile that it is the outrageous system of tariff taxation that is bringing about all our financial and commercial troubles, and that we had better be turning our attention to the obtaining of revenue by the remodeling of our system of customs duties. When that is done our currency will take care of itself, if we will only get clear of the banking monopoly which uses it to oppress the tax-payers of the country.

I rose principally for the purpose of calling attention to one portion of the tariff question. There is a highly respectable set of gentlemen here, or were lately, known as the representatives of the Silk Association of America, whose books are no doubt on all your tables, who are seeking in every way to increase the tariff on silk manufactures, which is now 60 per cent. in gold, equal on an average to 75 per cent. in the currency of the country. They are making complaint as though they were about to be ruined, because a few mixed ribbons that have some cotton or some wool in them have been allowed to come into the country at a tax on the consumer of 50 per cent. gold. They are here clamoring for Congress to increase the duties on them also to the 60 per cent. rule, in order, as they claim, to make the tax uniform, and protect them in their industries.

Several of these gentlemen, I will not say where, have been discussing this question in my presence. And when I was insisting upon putting the tariff upon all these articles down to 50 per cent. instead of allowing mixed ribbons to be advanced to 60, as being a sufficient protection and bonus to them, the cry was at once raised by them, "You will drive us out of business if you do that; we cannot live at that figure." The question was then asked, "What is the amount of your production of silk?" The answer was, "About $30,000,000 a year." What is the amount of silk imported? The books show that it is about $30,000,000; therefore the consumption of silk is about $60,000,000, $30,000,000 of it imported. Counting all the imports at 60 per cent., we get a revenue of about $18,000,000 out of a consumption of $60,000,000. Reduce the tariff to 50 per cent. and drive all these gentlemen out of the business if you please; the consumption of silk in this country will not be less, but by the natural operation of the increase of the people, and in consequence of the reduction of duty, the consumption would doubtless reach $70,000,000. Fifty per cent. upon $70,000,000 would produce $35,000,000 of revenue if all these manufacturers should quit the business.

They state that all their machinery, all their material, all their property, at the highest estimate they put upon it, will reach only $15,000,000. They employ, say, two thousand men, beside women and children. It is obvious from their own statements, and will be apparent to every gentleman who looks at it, that if you reduce the duties on silk from 60 per cent. to 50 per cent., and, if you please, drive all these men out of the manufacture entirely, you would instantly get $35,000,000 of revenue instead of $18,000,000. In that way, in one year, you could get an excess of revenue which would enable you to pay them their $15,000,000, every dollar that they have invested in the business, and you would have $2,000,000, or enough to furnish $1,000 apiece to each man they employ, with which he could buy a farm in the West, and stock it. We would get $35,000,000 a year from the silk consumption alone, from which we are now getting only $18,000,000. And yet these men are clamoring for a still further increase of protection to their productions, which would result in diminishing our revenues. That is only one case; there are hundreds of others of the same sort, illustrating equally well the working of the present high protective, anti-revenue tariff taxation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I desire to ask the gentleman, for information, whether these manufacturers really ask for this increase of duties on silk goods, or simply ask for such a construction of the tariff as will prevent an evasion under existing laws?

Mr. BECK. They ask to have all goods in which silk predominates made uniform at 60 per cent.; call it what you please. I will state it fairly. A large portion of ribbons, made mostly of silk mixed with wool or cotton, come in at 50 per cent. duty. They want the duty made 60 per cent. on that as well as on the other goods. You can call it evasion, or increase, or what you please. They want an increase of 10 per cent. upon the present rate.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The reason for asking was this, as I understood the silk manufacturers: a duty of 60 per cent. being levied, a style of evasion had grown up by slipping in a little of other fiber, and in consequence calling it something else than silk goods. That affected our revenue and defrauded the manufacturer. Therefore they want to head off these foreign fraudulent manufacturers by saying that a thread of cotton or wool should not prevent the goods from being called what they really are, silk goods.

Mr. BECK. If there is any fraud perpetrated, it is perpetrated by the Secretary of the Treasury and his regulations, is it not?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. He was obliged to construe the law so. I understand he is willing to have this change made.

Mr. BECK. The importers commit no fraud when they comply with the law as the Secretary construes it. I suppose he is willing, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and all those from the eastern sea-board are willing, to keep up this taxation under the plea of protecting home industry to the exclusion really of nearly all revenue. The same feeling that led them to take the tariff from tea and coffee, every cent of which goes into the Treasury, and the same feeling that would make them willing to take off all the internal taxes because every dollar goes into the Treasury, would make them want to pile up the duties on everything which they want to make and sell to the western agricultural regions, and the regions south of the Potomac, at the premium which the prohibitory tax adds to its real value. It is because that system has been kept up, and the Government has been managed in the interests of great monopolists and protected interests, so that every dollar which gets into the Treasury costs the people more than three dollars to get it there, that we now are in trouble in regard to our currency.

I want to read one or two sketches well drawn by gentlemen on this floor. And as I, as well as my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] believe in the principle of "ding-dong," it is well enough to let the people see these sketches as often as possible.

My friend from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] in a very able speech which he made in this House on this subject, went on to show how this thing works. He said:

> So it is with the people of the West. They have been tapped by the protective system. A ceaseless stream flows ever from their veins, unconsciously to many of them. They are paying taxes every day of their lives on every tool they use, on everything they eat, drink, or wear.
> The farmer starting to his work has a shoe put on his horse with nails taxed 67 per cent., driven by a hammer taxed 54 per cent.; cuts a stick with a knife taxed 50 per cent.; hitches his horse to a plow taxed 50 per cent., with chains taxed 67 per cent. He returns to his home at night and lays his wearied limbs on a sheet taxed 58 per cent.; and covers himself with a blanket that has paid 250 per cent. He rises in the morning, puts on his humble flannel shirt taxed 80 per cent.; his coat taxed 50 per cent.; shoes taxed 35 per cent., and hat taxed 70 per cent.; opens family worship by a chapter from his Bible taxed 25 per cent.; and kneels to his God on a humble carpet taxed 150 per cent.; he sits down to his humble meal from a plate taxed 40 per cent.; with knife and fork 35 per cent.; drinks his cup of coffee taxed 47 per cent., or tea 78 per cent.; with sugar 70 per cent.; seasons his food with salt taxed 100 per cent.; pepper 297 per cent., or spice 379 per cent. He looks around upon his wife and children all taxed in the same way; takes a chew of tobacco taxed 100 per cent., or lights a cigar taxed 120 per cent., and then thanks his stars that he lives in the freest and best Government under heaven. If on the Fourth of July he wants to have the star-spangled banner on real bunting he must pay the American Bunting Company of Massachusetts 100 per cent. for this glorious privilege. No wonder, sir, that the western farmer is struggling with poverty, and conscious of a wrong somewhere, although he knows not whence the blow comes that is chaining him to a life of endless toil, and reducing his wife and children to beggary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From whose speech has the gentleman been reading?

Mr. BECK. From a speech of Hon. SAMUEL S. MARSHALL, of Illinois; it would do the gentleman from Pennsylvania good to read it all.

Mr. Brooks, of New York, made a speech equally good upon the same subject, and I will make a short quotation from it also, as I want the men of the West to see these speeches, and reflect on the facts set forth in them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to say a word in regard to the remarks of Mr. MARSHALL.

Mr. BECK. I will give you plenty of time hereafter; let me read an extract from Mr. Brooks's speech first.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the gentleman will allow me a minute.

Mr. BECK. O, you shall have all day if you want it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I have found out the cat that is in the gentleman's well.

Mr. BECK. My friend from New York (Mr. Brooks) exhibited in the speech to which I refer the taxes which a man pays upon a suit of clothes. Let me read his language:

> TAX ON MAN WHEN IN HIS CLOTHES.

Now, since I am reading extracts, let me read from the remarks of another gentleman quite as well known, Hon. Michael C. Kerr, of Indiana.

Mr. KELLEY. Why does not the gentleman go back to the original and read from Sidney Smith, from whom all this is taken?

Mr. BECK. I would rather read from the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to whom I will come after awhile.

Mr. KELLEY. It was Sidney Smith who originally drew the picture of a man pursued by taxes from the cradle to the grave.

Mr. BECK. My friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who I see is about to rise, no doubt would like to go back to Sidney Smith, and I will not interfere with him.

In the debate of which the speech of Mr. Kerr is a part, gentlemen had referred to the luxury of a "free breakfast-table." Mr. Kerr went on to show that this talk of a "free breakfast-table" was a pointed absurdity. Let me read what he said:

> Under our present tariff, and, indeed, so long as Government is supported by taxation, the promise or boast of a "free breakfast-table" is simply an able-bodied absurdity, no matter how free you make tea, coffee, and sugar. Let us see. Your table is held together by taxed nails and hinges, and covered with a taxed cloth. Your breakfast is prepared by a cook, or a good wife, who is clad from the soles of her feet to the top of her head in taxed clothing. It is prepared in a stove made of taxed iron, over a fire made of taxed coal, kindled with a taxed match, and adjusted with taxed shovel and tongs. Your bread is leavened with taxed soda, saleratus, or yeast powders. Your victuals are served to you on taxed dishes, and eaten from taxed plates, or drunk out of taxed cups, saucers, or tumblers, with the aid of taxed knives, forks, and spoons. Your food is seasoned with taxed salt, pepper, vinegar, oil, or other condiments. Your meal may consist in part of taxed fruits, such as prunes, figs, raisins, or nuts. Your bread, potatoes, and other substantials of daily diet are produced by the farmer by the aid of taxed implements of every kind, and brought to your house over railroads or on wagons made of taxed iron and steel. Your good wife is even compelled to seek culinary wisdom from a cook-book printed on taxed paper, with taxed ink and taxed type.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I merely want to make this remark——

Mr. BECK. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to make a speech; I thought he wished to put a question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not a question; I merely wished to remark that the gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. BECK. I do not yield for a speech in my time. If the gentleman wants to ask me a question, I will answer.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well; I will ask a question. Does not the gentleman know that all the gentlemen who made these three speeches with regard to taxed articles have borrowed the whole of their ideas from that old Englishman, Sidney Smith, who in 1820 went over precisely the same argument in order to depreciate American institutions?

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, every wise man who has looked at this subject before Sidney Smith's time, and during his time, and since, has used these arguments; and I only repeat them, and lay them before the country now, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania and men like him succeeded during years of war in increasing the tariff, which in 1860 was enabling us to do the carrying trade of the world, the average tariff being then 20 per cent., up to 60 per cent., thus enriching Pennsylvania and New England at the expense of the agricultural regions; and then, when the war was over, they raised the cry for reconstruction, not because of the disloyalty of the people of the South, but because they did not intend Representatives should come here from the South to unite with the men of the West and overthrow the iniquitous tariff they had imposed upon the country. It was in order to perpetuate it, as they had been able to do, that they disfranchised eleven States and 9,000,000 people, and sent their carpet-baggers here to do their bidding, and vote to keep up the iniquities they have so far succeeded in doing. Whenever the men of the country understand this matter, and the Southern States are free to vote as they please, this tariff will go down once more to the minimum standard. Then will the ideas of Sidney Smith, reiterated, if you please, by the three gentlemen from whose speeches I have read and by thousands of others all over the country—then will these ideas again be acted upon and become principles in our legislation, and the men all over the country, except a few protected monopolists, supported by the other great systems of consolidated wealth which have been controlling this Government in their own interests to the injury of all else, will return to those true principles and ideas which are repeated because they are true; and when they do, the maxim will be that we shall have tariff for revenue, and not tariff to exclude revenue, so as to enrich a few favored interests. When that is done, you will have no trouble about your finances or your currency. The Government will then take its own paper for its customs dues, which it now repudiates, in order to add 12 to 20 per cent. upon the tariff in favor of its bondholders and monopolists, while it compels me and every other man to take it.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his friends are now seeking to turn attention to the currency to the exclusion of all else, in order to plaster over a sore which is only evidence of the diseased condition of the blood of the patient; and the more they plaster it the worse it will get, unless they eradicate the diseased condition which caused it. Give the people of the country a proper system of finance, give them relief from taxation, which destroys instead of producing revenue. Let us so legislate as to diminish the burdens of the people, and all will be well. I do not say my friend from Pennsylvania would try to divert us from that subject, but the course of that gentleman, and those like him, seems very much like it; and I know from his antecedents it would suit his purpose if he could so divert us; but I see he is so impatient that I must give way to him.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir. I said I would yield to you any time or all the time; and that it was only a question for you as to which you would prefer.

Mr. KELLEY. All I ask is that you shall not consume all the time you have, but will yield me a little of it, and not exclude me from the chance to reply.

Mr. BECK. How much?

Mr. KELLEY. I make the request, because you began your remarks with a special allusion to me.

Mr. BECK. Of course.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to say first, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think it is right for the gentleman to come into this House and ding-dong into our ears the old free-trade speech by which he supported Horace Greeley in Kentucky in the last presidential contest. [Laughter.] I think he might bring us something fresh. This was bad enough, but it was still worse to go to Sidney Smith, the English tory, for arguments, and present them here as they have been, rehashed by men who have not even taken the trouble to examine and see whether Mr. Smith's arguments illustrated American laws or only those of England. For instance, in the first speech from which the gentleman read, it is said we had a duty of 200 per cent. on pepper to protect our pampered manufacturers. I wish he would tell me where black pepper is manufactured in the United States, and who manufactures it. [Laughter.] Representing the workingmen of the country, I strove against the gentleman from Kentucky to get the inordinate duty on pepper repealed, as I did the duty on tea and coffee.

I have, by the gentleman's cry of ding-dong, discovered, as I said during his remarks, the color and size of the cat in his well. [Laughter.] He made a speech one day this week on currency, and went so far beyond my views that I went over and congratulated him on his conversion to the true faith. Thus committed, he cannot reply to my remarks on the currency question; he cannot answer the article from his great leader, Horace Greeley, which I read a few moments ago.

Mr. BECK. And I was amazed at your reading it.

Mr. KELLEY. Therefore he attempts a diversion by talks on the tariff. O, if we were not under parliamentary restraint how I would like to characterize the want of clearness and the incoherence with which he talks. [Laughter.] I am engaged in a struggle for cheap money; that is, for money at a low rate of interest; for a currency based on the national credit, which will take the industries of the country out of the hands of credit-mongers and the banking monopoly, and give them, as they had before we contracted the currency, money at 6 per cent. and put the business of the country on the cash system. Why do I want it, sir? The gentleman has been on this floor with me for many years, but he has never heard me advocate a protective duty that was not for the purpose of contervailing two evils which assailed the very foundations of our industries. The one was the low wages paid to the oppressed workmen of Great Britain and the continent; the other was the higher rate of interest paid for credit or money in this country than is paid abroad. And when I listened to his glowing words the other day I hailed him as a co-worker, as one whose influence on this floor might enable me some day, without injustice to the working classes of the country, to concede a reduction of the tariff. This can be done if you will give us cheap money; if you will allow the American people to have sufficient currency with which to conduct the business of the country; if you will not say, as you do, that you must do business with no more of the symbol of value, of the medium of exchange, than you employed in 1860. Suppose, sir, Congress were to limit by law the number of locomotives and of cars to the number employed in 1860 or 1864, I apprehend that such a law would put locomotives and cars at a premium and increase the rates of freight. The supply would be inadequate to the demand. And yet engines and trains of cars are but the medium of exchange by which commodities are transferred from place to place, as currency is the medium of exchange by which the same commodities are transferred from person to person. And there is not a school-boy in Pennsylvania ten years old that would not tell the gentleman that the way to remove the necessity for high duties is to give the producing classes cheaper money and an adequate amount of it; and who would not see that on Wednesday or Thursday, whichever it was, he walked in one direction, and that fearing that he may have done right, for once, he is to-day retracing his steps to make a record which will cover his retreat and protect him from the charge of having been overpersuaded by Old Pig-iron.

Mr. BECK. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania finished?

Mr. KELLEY. Entirely; unless you arouse me again. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. I have no more to say. I wanted merely to address a few remarks to my friend [Mr. KELLEY] to try to start him at the right end, or at least to keep him from obstructing us in our efforts to do so. I do not see that he ought to complain of my referring to my friends Mr. Brooks, Mr. Kerr, and Mr. MARSHALL, or even to Sydney Smith.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not complain of your referring to Sydney Smith; but I complain that you do not go to the fountain-head and give us the pure liquor.

Mr. BECK. Why did the gentleman read from Horace Greeley if it was not because he regarded him as good authority? Why did he read a chapter from Benjamin Franklin, one hundred and ten years old, last Saturday, and hold that up as an example of sound views, if we cannot also go back to the example of some of those wise old men? I thought I was but walking in the gentleman's own footsteps.

I will say, before I sit down, that I have listened with much pleasure to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SAYLER] attacking to-day another of those monster monopolies. I hope the bill he has introduced, or something like it, will deal with these great patent monopolies. They are in the same line with, if not so extensive in their ramifications as, the tariff monopolies.

I was in the city of Paris last summer, and other gentlemen with me made the same test. We found that we could buy there sewing-machines made in Connecticut and in New York at thirty dollars or thirty-five dollars, which you could not buy at the manufactory for less than seventy dollars. What does that mean? It means that these things are not worth over twenty dollars or twenty-five dollars, because the manufacturers can transport them to Europe and sell them for thirty-five dollars. And yet by virtue of this patent monopoly they sell them here at seventy dollars, and no man or woman can get them for less. And so it is with all these other things. I repeat that I was very glad to hear the gentleman from Indiana attacking that monopoly to-day, and I hope he will continue to assail it till it and the protective tariff fall together.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as part of the debates, some remarks on banking and currency. [See Appendix.]

Mr. RANSIER obtained the floor, and yielded ten minutes to Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut.

REVENUE PROTECTION.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I begin with a remark that may not be strictly connected with what I shall say afterward. But when I hear our distinguished friend from Kentucky speak with no little sarcasm and bitterness of carpet-baggers, I confess it amuses me. I, also, like the gentleman from Kentucky, have Scotch blood, and that considered to be of a good stock, in my veins. But when my good friend from the Highlands—I hope it was from there; it is from the Highlands that I trace part of my ancestry—when my good friend from the Highlands of Scotland begins to reproach the Yankee who happens to hold office in the South, or the Southerner who happens to hold office in the North, with being a carpet-bagger, I am legitimately amused. How many of us were born in the States we have the honor to represent? This is the country of carpet-baggers. I see that I am honored with the attention of my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who would, no doubt, be ready in his smiling way to amuse us for an hour on this subject. I do not believe there is any Knownothingism about him.

Mr. COX. I believe in the right of coming and going.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I had no reference to that gentleman when I spoke of the carpet-bag question. I was thinking more particularly of Plymouth Rock, the blarney stone of New England, when I referred to him, and of the history that he might make of that kind of carpet-bagging.

What I wanted to say was, that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and others who talk as he does about the tariff question, are a great deal mistaken about New England. I think I can give him a little information on that subject. They seem to think that they would inflict a fatal blow on the interests of New England if they should—I will not say return to, but if they should—adopt what is called the free-trade or revenue tariff. Sir, they never were more mistaken in their lives. The weight of the injury would not fall upon New England. You have been levying duties in this country for generations. You drove New England from the seas where she was making her money by navigation, and you compelled her to build up in her valleys and on her rocky hills her system of manufactures. All over that sterile country you will find, nestled in nooks here and there, manufacturing establishments that have grown up through the industry and thrift and ingenuity of the fathers or the grandfathers of the men who are now working in them. They know how to make the articles they manufacture cheaper than anybody else. They live economically in their little homes, without extra expense or taxation, and they have their business established.

Now, if you want to return to a revenue tariff, and take the duties off the raw articles which they use in their manufactures, very good; that will help them so much the more. But you say that you want to take the duty off the manufactured articles also. Very well; do you think that will kill them? No, sir; but it will kill all competition in the newer sections of the country, which have an interest in building up manufactures.

Sir, I would like the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to take a ride with me through New England; to go up into the far interior, to see the coal lugged up there by main force from Pennsylvania, and the iron from Pennsylvania or Europe, and the cotton from the fair fields of Alabama and Georgia. All these heavy articles are laboriously carried up into these interior villages, and there manufactured into goods that go all over the world.

You say you do not want these manufactories in the West and the South. Sir, it strikes me that the very thing you do want in the Southern States is to build up cotton manufactories. If you want to give us in New England the best bounty you can imagine to protect us against your competition, then take off many of these duties. The time has come in the history of this country when protection is more needed in the West, and the South, and the Southwest, than it is by New England.

I do not deny that if you should make what some call a free-trade tariff you would injure some branches of manufacture that have been established there under what was supposed to be a settled policy of the country; you would cripple them very much. But a Yankee always alights on his feet. And if there is anything to be made in this country, I do not care what it is, from a watch up to a locomotive, he will make it as cheap as anybody in the country can make it. So, unless you adopt such a course of legislation as to entirely destroy all manufactures, the New Englander will be even with the foremost man in the race.

Do not think you can fatally hurt us. I know you do not mean it in any malicious spirit; but do not think that we are dependent upon your bounty. I point you to the brain of New England, that has invented every bright and good thing almost that you know of. I point you to my little State of Connecticut, that takes out 50 per cent. more patents in proportion to its population than any other State; more than that inventive State of Massachusetts, or the State of Rhode Island. Do you think that by any change in your tariff laws you can kill us? Sir, we are not beggars at your hands or at anybody's hands.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The invention of Whitney.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Yes; there was Whitney the New Englander, who by his invention of the cotton-gin doubled, tripled, quadrupled, quintupled, and twenty-folded the value of every acre of land in the South adapted to the cultivation of cotton. Before his invention you picked the seeds out of the cotton, with laborious industry, with your fingers, until he put a machine there which picked your cotton clean of its seeds and gave it to you like snow-flakes in its purity. I could not begin in two hours to give you a history of the ingenuity of the Yankee. Do not think that you can kill us by any change in your tariff laws. I would be delighted to talk over with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] what is called the revenue tariff system. I am not an extreme protectionist. There are men in my State who make keen-edged tools who care nothing about your tariff.

Mr. COX. They want it reduced on iron and steel.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not want to quarrel with my Pennsylvania friends on the iron and steel question. We cannot afford to have a dispute with different sections of the country about that matter.

I have constituents who send edged tools to be sold in almost all quarters of the globe. Even in the colonies of England these American articles, coming in competition with those of the best English makers, take the lead.

Not long ago I stopped at a town in Massachusetts, not far from Boston, where a man was putting up a heavy consignment of tacks for Melbourne, Australia. He told me that he could make them cheaper and handsomer, and put them up in better shape, than the English manufacturers.

My Pennsylvania friends and my friends from the West, who are interested in the production of iron and coal as well as a thousand new industries which are about to be introduced, are not the men to go back upon us in New England.

I want to say one word about these free-trade notions that we occasionally hear expressed here. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] complained a little, as I understood, that the duties had been removed from tea, coffee, sugar, and articles of that sort; and he has been complaining somewhat about the duty on silks. Now, I believe in taxing the luxuries and vices of the people; I believe in taxing all the costlier manufactures which are used by the rich. I believe in this upon general principles, wholly outside of the question of protection. But the gentleman from Kentucky and his friends think it better to collect the revenues of the Government upon tea, coffee, and sugar. They are everlastingly pointing to the British tariff under which a hundred millions of revenue are collected solely from a few articles—tea, coffee, and sugar, as well as wines, ales, &c. They think this an equitable mode of taxation; but they never made a greater mistake in their lives. John Smith, coachman, with half a dozen children, uses almost as much tea, coffee, and sugar as Mr. Jones, the millionaire, who employs him. Hence, under the free-trade tariff the coachman would pay just as much to the support of the Government as would the millionaire. Thus a free-trade tariff is a sort of poll-tax or per capita tax—the most odious of all taxes imaginable.

But the men who voted for the removal of the duties on tea, coffee, and sugar were, as I remember, not all republicans. If the democratic party insists on reimposing those duties, let them bring a bill for that purpose, and make a high fight upon principle for it; let them at the same time take off the duties on broadcloths, silks, champagnes, and a wide range of costly goods purchased only by the rich. Let them thus levy a poll-tax upon the poor man, so that the man who earns two dollars a day and lives on it will pay just as much revenue, in the form of duty on tea, coffee, and sugar, as the man who owns his millions.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman will allow me to state that the bill repealing the duty on tea and coffee, was introduced by a democratic member of this House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I think it very likely. I hold that this system of taxation which is called a revenue tariff——

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Wait a moment.

Mr. COX. You are not doing justice to the democratic side of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Do not be afraid; I will not hurt you; you can take care of yourself and me too. [Laughter.]

Apart from the question of protection or free trade, the revenue tariff of Great Britain is the most unjust tariff levied by any government of which I have any knowledge.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANSIER resumed the floor.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. RANSIER. I have no objection to yielding five minutes.

Mr. COX. I do not want to dispute anything that has been said by my free-trade friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] who has come as near as he could to the true doctrine while seeking still to preserve his relations with the Pennsylvania republican protectionists. Just a moment ago my friend said that he did not want to break with his Pennsylvania friends. Why, sir, I supposed he was the most independent man in this House. I supposed that in standing up for a principle he would break a lance with anybody, whether interested in steel, or coal, or anything else. Sir, I know from representations made to me by men who deal in the article that if you cut down the tariff on steel you will add to the revenue. So with other articles, including articles of luxury, such as laces. You can stop smuggling and add to the revenue some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 by such a reduction of duty. But you have not the courage to do it. You cower before the republican protectionists of Pennsylvania; and you have at the same time an alliance with the democratic protectionists of that State.

The gentleman will excuse me for taking care of the democratic side of the House.

Mr. SPEER. To what sort of alliance does the gentleman refer?

Mr. COX. Armed and unarmed, generally unarmed; offensive and defensive, but a little more offensive than defensive. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANSIER. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. Thank you. I want to say one word to my colored friend. I say men of his position in this House, and in the country, who are looking to the wool and the clothing of the colored people, who are looking after the shovel and the hoe, the knives, the cutlery, and the agricultural implements all through the West and all through the South, should join New England now in order to have cheap caloric to run the engines and thus to have cheap cutlery, cheap agricultural implements. He will find by that system, if he remains in Congress long, we will increase the revenue by decreasing the tariff, as in England, where they have added £5,000,000 sterling to the revenue while reducing the expenses. And Mr. Gladstone brags of it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Let me ask the gentleman from New York whether paupers have not been increasing there in the same ratio?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does not England get her revenue largely from Kentucky, by tax on Kentucky whisky and tobacco?

Mr. RANSIER. I must notice, before I go to the subject of civil rights which I have risen to discuss, a remark of my facetious friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] when he appealed to me as one of those desiring to give woolen and cotton goods, &c., to the colored people. I sympathize with him in that regard, but I object to any discrimination on account of color in that or any other matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I tell the gentleman I too am against discrimination in the color of the goods to be supplied to the colored people. [Laughter.]

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. RANSIER. Mr. Speaker, but for some remarks made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARRIS,] the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] and the gentleman from New York, our learned and genial friend, [Mr. COX,] during the protracted debate on civil rights, made before and subsequent to the recommittal of the bill on the subject to the Judiciary Committee, which in my judgment call for a specific reply, I would not again ask the attention and indulgence of the House for myself.

Statements have been made by one or all of these gentlemen, and others who oppose such a bill, as many of us think ought to pass, that ought not to go to the country uncontradicted, and a condition of affairs pictured by them as likely to follow its enactment into law which if true or likely to occur ought to go far toward the defeat of such a measure. If, on the other hand, these statements are shown to be untrue and to rest upon no foundation in point of fact, and that the enactment of such a law by Congress will be of benefit to all classes of our people and promotive of the ends of justice, of concord, and harmonious relationships, as we think we can show, then we cannot pass this measure a day too soon.

Mr. Speaker, this measure has been presented to us in masterly efforts in its constitutional aspects, and we are asked to consider it now in the light of practical statesmanship. We are asked to consider what would be the effect of its operation as to our school system and upon the relationships between the races. To these inquiries I propose to address myself as briefly as possible, and to this end I ask the indulgence of the House.

Before proceeding I desire to express my regret that anything should have occurred calculated to create ill-feeling between members of this House during this debate, and which the press of the country has characterized as contravening the legitimate limits of parliamentary courtesy.

It were far better if grave questions such as are involved in the consideration of a measure like this could be discussed in a spirit of fairness, and without passion or indulgence in such allusions as are calculated to give offense to members personally. Each of the friends of the measure, however, can say truthfully, "Thou canst not say, I did it: never shake thy gory locks at me."

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARRIS,] in his speech on the bill, said:

> I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that a very large majority of the republican members of this House do not understand the true condition of affairs in the South. For if they did, and are sincere in their avowals of solicitude for the welfare of the country, and especially for the prosperity and advancement of the colored race, I am very sure that they would indicate it in some better way than the adoption of legislative enactments which in my judgment, when tried, will not only prove unacceptable to the masses of colored people at the South, but alike destructive of the harmony and great interests of both races.

Now, sir, I am sure that a very large majority of the republican members of this House do know the true condition of affairs in the South, hence the desire on their part for the passage of such a measure. As to the remark that such enactments, "when tried, will not only prove unacceptable to the masses of colored people at the South, but alike destructive of the harmony and great interests of both races," he evidently misunderstands the situation himself. He is not the only member who has said during this debate that the colored people, the masses of them, are not asking for the passage of such a bill. The gentleman from Texas suggested the same thing.

THE COLORED PEOPLE A UNIT FOR CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. Speaker, there are organizations in nearly every State in the Union the object of which, in part at least, is to endeavor to secure for the colored people of the country their equal rights. They have been asking this of the country, through individuals with delegated authority to act, through State and county organizations, and through national conventions assembled for the purpose. In this connection I quote from the journal of the proceedings of the convention of colored men held at Columbia, South Carolina, October 18, 1871; which convention was composed of regularly elected delegates from nearly every Southern State:

To the People of the United States of America:

FELLOW-CITIZENS: The colored people of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and the District of Columbia, have delegated to us, their representatives, assembled in convention, authority to give expression to their purposes, desires, and feelings, in view of the relation they sustain to the Government and people of the United States, under the course of events that has arisen since, and as a consequence of, the war of rebellion.

We owe to Almighty God and the spirit of liberty and humanity that animates the great body of the people of this country the personal liberty and the rights of citizenship that we enjoy, and shall, under the promptings of duty, labor for the permanence and perfection of the institutions that have served as the great instrument of consummating this act of justice.

In seeking more perfect recognition as members of the great political family to which the interests of humanity have been peculiarly committed, we desire to recognize our obligations and responsibilities as members of this great family, and to assure the American people that we stand among them imbued with a national spirit, with confidence in and devotion to the principles of representative popular government, and with ideas of policy that embrace every individual and interest of our common country.

We ask of you that you will give to the Government the fullest measure of moral support, to enable it to complete that which is so auspiciously begun, and that minor differences of sentiment and policy may be hushed while the nation is gathering up its strength to purge the land of the foulest crimes by the sword of justice. When the nation was threatened with division, political differences yielded to the necessity of maintaining its territorial integrity. Now, that it is again threatened from the vortex of passion and crime affiliated, let the same devotion to right and justice induce equal efforts to preserve its moral integrity.

While there remains anything to be accomplished, in order to secure for ourselves the full enjoyment of civil and political rights, we shall have class interests calling for the united efforts of persons of color. The moment these ends are secured, the motives for separate action will cease, and, in common with all other citizens, we can take our places wherever the interest of the Government, industry, or humanity may appoint, recognizing only one standard of duty, interest, or policy for all citizens.

We do not ask the Government or people of the United States to treat us with peculiar favor, but that, in the policy of the laws, our interest may be grouped with those that receive the consideration of our legislative bodies, and that, in the administration of the laws, no invidious distinctions be made to our prejudice.

We affirm that the colored people of the States represented by us have no desire to strike out a line of policy for their action involving interests not common to the whole people.

While we have, as a body, contributed our labor in the past to enhance the wealth and promote the welfare of the community, we have, as a class, been deprived of one of the chief benefits to be derived from industry, namely, the acquisition of education and experience, the return that civilization makes for the labor of the individual. Our want, in this respect, not only extends to general education and experience, such as fits the man to adorn the society of his fellows, but that special education and experience required to enable us to enter successfully the departments of a diversified industry.

The growth of this nation has shown that its institutions are capable of blending into a harmonious brotherhood all nationalities and all interests and industries. In all other instances than that of the accession of our race to citizenship, the accretion of the elements of its population has been gradual, giving time to complete the process of assimilation. In our case we are well aware that there was much to alarm the apprehensions of those careful statesmen who hesitated to speculate as to the strength of our institutions much beyond what was demonstrated by the precedents in parallel cases in Europe and in our own country. The instantaneous embodiment of four million citizens who had for years looked upon the Government as not only denying them citizenship, but as preventing them from acquiring that capacity under any other national existence, was, it must be admitted, a startling political fact.

But we are happy to point to the proof of the wisdom of those who regarded that course the safest that was indicated by the demands of justice. We are proud to be able to point to the history of our people since their admission to citizenship as proof that they understand what is due from the citizen to the Government owing him protection. Although they have suffered much at the hands of those who would deprive them of their rights, they have appreciated the difficulties and embarrassments that necessarily surrounded the attempts of the Government to vindicate their rights, and have waited uncomplainingly until relief could be afforded; although many times they could have found instantaneous relief by imitating their oppressors and taking the law into their own hands.

A convention subsequently held at New Orleans, Louisiana, which was composed of delegates from all parts of the country, issued a similar address as did the one recently held in this city. I have similar papers from meetings held all over this country to the same import. I will call attention to the following, which has been adopted by the Legislature of my own State; and be it known that in that Legislature there are about thirty-five democrats. The News and Courier newspaper, published in the city of Charleston, where I live, one of the leading democratic organs of the South, commenting upon the adoption of these resolutions, says that the democratic members, with a single exception, in both houses, voted for them. The following are the resolutions:

SUMNER AND CIVIL RIGHTS.

The following preamble and resolutions were adopted almost unanimously, only one vote being in the negative:

Whereas the recent introdution of the civil-rights bill in the Senate of the United States, by Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, Senator from Massachusetts, shows that he is determined to crown a series of inestimable services to the cause of freedom and equal rights in America by removing the last vestige of the late barbarism, and placing the capstone of equal civil rights on the dome of the reconstructed Union; and whereas the State of South Carolina, ever mindful of the rights of all her citizens, and watchful for their privileges, has placed on her statute-book a bill to protect them in their civil rights within her domain; but is aware of its inadequacy to protect them when outside her limits; and whereas both by a common line of policy and by the solemn pledges of the Philadelphia convention, by the noble words of the last inaugural, and by the sentiments of our dominant party, the national and State republicans, and the honored Chief Magistrate, have placed themselves on record as favoring the passage of such a bill; and whereas a large party of the loyal citizens of this State and of the nation, irrespective of their intelligence, wealth, or position, whether they are private citizens or public officials, are discriminated against, in public travel and in places of general entertainment, to the degradation of their manhood and the violation of their rights as human beings: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we instruct our Senators and request our Representatives in Congress assembled to sustain, by their influence and by their votes, the bill introduced by Senator SUMNER to attain the equality of civil rights before the law.

Resolved, That we sympathize with the movement on the part of the large class of citizens whose rights are thus willfully and persistently outraged to unite in a convention on the 8th of December, 1873, to memorialize Congress on this subject; and in view of the near approach of the meeting aforesaid, we, representing the people of the State of South Carolina, authorize those of our Representatives who may be identified with the class whose rights are thus daily violated to attend the said convention and represent our State.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be engrossed and forwarded to Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, his excellency the President of the United States, and to our Representatives in Congress, and to the president of the equal rights convention.

I call the attention also to the following, a copy of which has just been presented in another body:

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, January 26, 1874.

Whereas Hon. A. H. STEPHENS, in his speech before Congress January 5, 1874, said that colored people of the State of Georgia did not desire the passage of the civil-rights bill; and whereas the Georgia Legislature has also adopted resolutions informing the Congress of the United States that the colored people of Georgia do not desire the passage of said civil-rights bill; and whereas the allegations of Mr. STEPHENS and the Georgia Legislature are without foundation in fact: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, a portion of the colored citizens of Georgia, do most solemnly deny both the speech of A. H. STEPHENS and said resolutions of the Georgia Legislature, so far as they relate to the colored citizens of this State being adverse to the passage of said civil-rights bill.

Resolved, That some arrangement be made by this meeting to deny the fact of the said assertions of Mr. STEPHENS and the Georgia Legislature.

Resolved, That we, the citizens of the city of Atlanta, Georgia, immediately inform the Congress of the United States that we desire a speedy passage of the civil-rights bill, and that we claim it as a right they owe us as members of the republican party, and more particularly as citizens of the United States.

Resolved, That we most heartily congratulate and thank Mr. ELLIOTT for his able and pointed speech, January 6, 1874, in the House of Representatives of the United States, in behalf of the passage of the civil-rights bill, and in vindicating the ability and patriotism of the colored citizens of the country.

J. B. FULLER,
Chairman.
J. O. WIMBISH,
W. D. MOORE,
Secretaries.

Therefore, we, a committee appointed at a mass-meeting of the colored citizens of the city of Atlanta, Georgia, held on the 26th day of January, 1874, with power to forward the above expression of 11,000 of the colored citizens of this city, do make this petition:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned committee, do hereby respectfully petition your honorable bodies to speedily pass the civil-rights bill, now under consideration in Congress, as the earnest request of the above-stated citizens, with the further request that your honorable bodies will, in view of the unjust manner in which we are now treated by the Legislature and judicial tribunals in this State, enact such laws as, in your wisdom, are necessary to secure each citizen in the United States, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude, equal civil and political rights, privileges, and immunities before the law.

And we your petitioners will ever pray.

H. E. BAULDIN,
ROMULUS MOORE,
C. WIMBISH,
C. H. MORGAN,
JAS. A. TATE,
Committee.

I affirm, Mr. Speaker, that, so far from the masses of the colored people not desiring civil rights, no man could, having made known his object, obtain without intimidation or coercion in some form the signatures or assent of one hundred colored men in any State of the Union against the passage of a full and complete civil-rights bill by Congress, or to indicate a disapproval of it "when tried."

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] suggests that such a measure "will not only prove unacceptable to the masses of the colored people at the South, but alike destructive of the harmony and great interests of both races." Just here he thinks, and very properly so, is a wide field for practical statesmanship.

Mr. Speaker, not only since the rebellion, passing through some terrible scenes during and since reconstruction, (if indeed that work is completed,) and during the terrible four years when the country groaned amid the throes of rebellion, but during the entire two hundred and fifty years, whether as slave or freeman, has the black man in our country exhibited a patience under long suffering, a forbearance under most provoking circumstances, and a forgiving and friendly disposition, that make him at once a good and peaceable citizen and perhaps a study.

He is taunted for his conduct during the war by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] because he did not lay in ashes the home of his master and murder the women and children while he (the master) was engaged in that which the gentleman seems to glorify. He says:

Look at one more fact. Nearly three years before the war ended the four million negroes of the South knew that its result involved the question of their liberty. Yet while the continent shook with the earthquake of war, and nobody was at home but old men and boys to keep them in order, those negroes seized no weapon and struck no blow. I do not mention it as a reproach to them. It merits rather the thanks of southern men. I mention it only to show that the negro is not like the white man. What race of white men would have remained quiet under the same circumstances? When the proclamation of emancipation was issued the peculiar patrons of the negro in the North expected him to rise and throw off the yoke and butcher our wives and children; and in the abundance of their philanthropy and humanity they hoped so, too.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to say in reply to those remarks as to the conduct of the colored people during the rebellion. Upon this and some other points he has been answered by my colleague, [Mr. CAIN,] except that if (and I say this in the kindliest spirit) those with whom the gentleman acts politically had shown during the years of the agitation of the question of slavery in this country, especially in the past fifteen years or so, that patience, Christian spirit, and I might add good sense, exhibited by the negro during the rebellion, the country would not have been called upon to mourn the loss of three hundred thousand of her sons, cut off by the casualties of war, and to groan today under a debt of over $2,000,000,000.

Nor is this all. The gentleman from North Carolina uses language that is calculated to keep alive whatever of sectional feeling there may be existing between the people of the North and the people of the South, which it is the business of the statesmanship of to-day to allay and to bury in the oblivion of the past, if possible, in the interest of both sections and of all classes and colors. This language I shall not repeat; it is found in the concluding sentence of the extract of his speech just quoted.

Mr. Speaker, when I plead for the passage of a full and complete civil-rights bill that shall seek to prevent and punish discriminations against the citizen, I know that I speak for five million people, and ask for that which is a necessity to them; and when I say that these five million people desire to live on terms of amity with their white fellow-citizens, I know that I correctly represent them. The negro desires to forget the wrongs of the past, and has imposed no disabilities upon those who held him as a slave, when and where he has been in a position to do so; and he rejoices to-day, both from motives of patriotism and self-interest, that the bitter feeling against him in the South, especially on the part of those who were his owners, which found expression in acts of violence and butchery, is fast dying out; that a better state of feeling exists, which must increase as he becomes educated, and, therefore, better acquainted with his duties and responsibilities as a citizen, and as the other unlearns some of the teachings of the past.

THE NEGRO DESIRES HARMONIOUS RELATIONSHIP WITH ALL OTHER RACES.

Mr. Speaker, if I believed with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] that such a measure as the bill we are now discussing would be "destructive of the harmony and great interest of both races," I, for one, would not insist upon its passage. I insist upon it, sir, not only because it is right in the abstract, but also because I feel that it will remove from the field of politics that which goes far to array one class against the other, in the South especially, I mean those class and caste distinctions, and would go far to disarm the mere political demagogue who is ever on the alert to use the colored vote, indifferent as to the ultimate results, so long as their selfish purposes can be best served thereby. It will increase his opportunities for learning and make him a more intelligent and independent voter, and make him feel a deeper interest in those questions affecting his material welfare and that of the community in which he lives. He will then have no animosities to feed or nourish, or at least no occasion for any, and as he advances in the scale of intelligence and usefulness, and acquires wealth through the unobstructed avenues to the school-house and to the industrial marts, and finds his undisputed way to the witness-box, the jury-box, and the ballot-box, which is his right, then the prejudices against him will melt as does the snow under a burning sun. Then, and not until then, will a more harmonious relationship be brought about between him and his more favored brother, the Caucasian, to whose interest it is, especially in the South, that this desirable result should be brought about. Sir, permit me to say we want peace and good-fellowship in the South and throughout the country; we want race lines and sectional feelings blotted out and buried forever. We want new life and vigor infused into the arteries of our industries in the South; we want assistance in the direction of developing our vast and hidden material resources, and to rebuild our waste places, and to this end I ask, in the name of the black man and in the name of the white man of the South alike, the generous aid and encouragement of the powerful North, the great and liberal East, and the sturdy and growing West.

VINDICATION OF THE COLORED MAN AS A SOLDIER DURING THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROBBINS] said in his speech the other day, in which he compared the colored man to somebody's "merry-andrew," referring to the dissimilarity of the races, that "this is a question which has puzzled the brains of scientists for centuries," and that—

If we were in a lyceum discussing ethnology, I would enlarge upon and fortify it. Here I merely throw out the hint, to be laughed at by fools, but to be pondered by those who realize the mystery and (as Carlyle says) "the deep tragedy of human life."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I doubt not that if that gentleman undertook to discuss that subject, "which has puzzled the brains of scientists for centuries," in a lyceum, he would find as many fools, judged by his standard, among his audience as he must have noticed here when he made this modest exhibition of his prodigious attainments in the direction indicated.

I desire to call attention to another remark he made in the speech referred to. The honorable gentleman said:

Despite all that we have heard on that subject, the negro is no fighter. To prove that he is, we are pointed to the records of the recent war between the States. Yes; infuriated with whisky, he was brought to the scratch a few times, only to be sacrificed without result.

He said also:

Even here on this floor (and I mean no disrespect to any fellow-member by this remark) he does nothing, he says nothing, except as he is prompted by his managers; even here he obeys the bidding of his new white masters, who move him like a puppet on the chess-board.

As to this remark, Mr. Speaker, I beg to refer the honorable gentleman to the fifth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, and to call his attention to the terrible fate of the persons therein spoken of, (Ananias and Sapphira.) The gentleman is indeed fortunate in having escaped a similar fate while uttering the words just quoted from his speech.

As to the other remark, that the negro is no fighter, in proof of which he says that only fifteen hundred of them were killed in action during the rebellion, I have a word to say.

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, within anything like the time allowed, read over or quote the opinions of those who have made this very question raised by the gentleman a matter of study at any considerable length. I quote the following, however, from a book entitled Military Services of General David Hunter, United States Army, during the War of the Rebellion, pages 18 and 19, which, while it is complimentary to the colored soldier, also shows the animus underlying such statements as those made by this impartial "scientist" and others like him:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 1, 1863.

MY DEAR SIR: I am glad to see the accounts of your colored force at Jacksonville, Florida. I see the enemy are driving at them fiercely, as is to be expected. It is important to the enemy that such force shall not take shape, and grow, and thrive in the South; and in precisely the same proportion it is important to us that it shall; hence the utmost caution and vigilance is necessary on our part. The enemy will make extra efforts to destroy them, and we should do the same to preserve and increase them.

Yours, truly,

A. LINCOLN.

Major-General HUNTER.

I also quote from the same book, pages 26 and 27, being in part reply by General Hunter (who first employed colored men in the South as soldiers during the rebellion) to resolutions of the United States Senate inquiring as to the authority for so employing these people.

The general says:

The experiment of arming the blacks, so far as I have made it, has been a complete and marvelous success. They are sober, docile, attentive, and enthusiastic, displaying great natural capacities in acquiring the duties of the soldier. They are now eager beyond all things to take the field and be led into action, and it is the unanimous opinion of the officers who have had charge of them that, in the peculiarities of this climate and country, they will prove incalculable auxiliaries, fully equal to the similar regiments so long and successfully used by the British.

Nor was the conviction that the colored men could be employed to advantage as soldiers during the rebellion confined to the officers of the Union Army. The confederate government passed an act, approved March 30, 1865, authorizing the employment of negroes as soldiers. A copy of this act is printed in the report of the Secretary of War, first session Thirty-ninth Congress, pages 139 and 140. It reads as follows:

An act to increase the military forces of the Confederate States, &c.

That if under the previous sections of this act the president shall not be able to raise a sufficient number of troops to prosecute the war successfully and maintain the sovereignty of the States and the independence of the Confederate States, then he is hereby authorized to call on each State, whenever he thinks it expedient, for her quota of three hundred thousand troops in addition to those subject to military service under existing laws, or so many thereof as the president may deem necessary for the puposes therein mentioned, to be raised from such of the population, irrespective of color, in each State, as the proper authorities thereof may determine.

This law was never put in force, the rebellion having collapsed before colored men were mustered in that service vi et armis.

This action is the one remarkable instance where the southern people were perhaps a unit in favor of the doctrine of no discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

A study of the opinions expressed by one hundred and fifteen surgeons engaged in the examination of both black and white recruits and substitutes goes to substantiate an idea which is common among ethnological authorities, namely, that no race is equally adapted to all circumstances of life; that mankind obey the same general laws that govern the distribution of floræ and faunæ upon the earth; and that the isotherms between which are limited the health and development of the negro do not comprehend less space upon its surface than those within which the others are confined.

It may be confidently affirmed that the statistics of the Medical Bureau, which refer principally to physico-geographical influences and to the effects of the intermixture of blood upon the negro, when taken in connection with those parts of the Surgeon-General's forthcoming report in which he is regarded as amenable to the vicissitudes of war, will form a more complete and reliable physical history of this race than exists at this time.

It would not be in accordance with the plan of this report to enter upon a discussion of the comparative aptitude for military service exhibited by the two types of mankind of which I have been speaking without the accompanying tables as evidence of the data upon which my opinions were based.

It appears, however, that of the surgeons of boards of enrollment five have given their opinion that the negro recruits and substitutes examined by them were physically a better class of men than the whites; nineteen that they were equal; two that they were inferior. A favorable opinion as to their fitness for the Army is expressed by seventeen; a doubtful one, because of insufficient data on which to ground the decision, by forty-three; an unfavorable opinion by nine; and by twenty a statement of not having come to any conclusion upon this subject. The question of the prevalence of disease among the negro inhabitants of different sections of the country is one upon which, at present, no specific opinion can be expressed. As in the case of the white race it may be shown hereafter that their maladies conform to those general principles which have been heretofore established. The discussion of the physical characteristics of the negro, as involving the propriety of his use in war, only belongs to this department. It is difficult and, in the present state of science, most uncertain to erect upon any general characteristics of organization anything but the most general rules concerning the effect of that structure upon the moral and intellectual nature. It may be said, however, that there are not more instances of disqualifying causes of this nature among the negroes in proportion to the numbers examined than are to be found in the records of exemption among the white race.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the total number of white troops, regulars and volunteers, in service during the rebellion in the Union Army is put down at 2,041,154. Of this number 42,724 are reported killed in action, 1½ per cent.

The total number of colored troops in service during the rebellion was 180,000. Of that number 1,514 are put down as killed in action; to which number are added 896 reported missing by competent authority, who were evidently killed, making 2,410 or about 1½ per cent., showing on the whole a difference of about ⅛ of one per cent. When it is considered that the colored soldier participated in no battle, because he was not admitted into the service, until some of our heaviest battles were fought, is it not fair to strike off this difference of ⅛ of one per cent.? This done, would it not be fair to say that the white and the colored troops in the Union Army during the rebellion, in the direction indicated by the gentleman from North Carolina, stand upon about the same footing?

But, Mr. Speaker, enough of this. All of us might read the following lines, which are found in the works of CHARLES SUMNER, volume 2, page 34, to advantage. It appears that they were written by Edmund Waller:

Earth praises conquerors for shedding blood:
Heaven, those that love their foes and do 'em good.
It is terrestrial honor to be crowned
For strewing men, like rushes, on the ground:
True glory 'tis to rise above them all,
Without the advantage taken by their fall.
He that in fight diminishes mankind
Does no addition to his stature find;
But he that does a noble nature show,
Obliging others, still does higher grow:
For virtue practiced such an habit gives
That among men he like an angel lives;
Humbly he doth and without envy dwell,
Loved and admired by those he does excel.

Mr. Speaker, that which seems to be most objectionable to many gentlemen, some of whom are in favor of the bill in other respects, is the provision prohibiting discriminations in the public schools on account of color or race. It is feared, and so said by some gentlemen who favor the bill, that to incorporate this feature in the bill, and to attempt to enforce it, will destroy the school systems in the South especially, and operate as a check upon the education of the children of both races.

Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that these fears are well founded. About the same line of argument was urged by many good people as to the abolition of slavery and clothing the colored man with the elective franchise, and at every step in the grand march toward freedom. Yet, sir, in nearly every instance these objections and apprehensions vanished, and were in a great part lost sight of upon trial. Then, too, sir, the principle upon which you concede, if you please, the right of the colored man to the privileges of the car, the inn, the theater, the witness and the jury box, apply in this case as well.

Sir, the learned gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] whose speeches are always to be read with interest and profit, well said in a speech delivered here recently:

Is it not irrefragable that if the right to the inn, railroad, theater, and cemetery be conceded to the black (as provided in the civil-rights bill) to the same extent as to the white to enjoy them, (though the enjoyment of the grave-yard is perhaps a melancholy hilarity,) that the same right should be extended to them as to the schools? The colored members are correct in their reasoning, assuming these premises. Indeed, all the amis des noirs who have spoken, if right at all, are right in demanding equality alike in school and inn, in cemetery and car. When you debar them from the school you as much keep up the bar sinister as by keeping them from the play-house. Would it not be a craven logic, unworthy of the struggling blacks and their admirers, to insist on the one and not the other?

NON-PROSCRIPTIVE SCHOOLS PROMOTIVE OF HARMONY.

Sir, as to the practical working of non-proscriptive schools, or, in other words, schools where black and white are taught in the North and East as well as in the South, it does not appear that either race is injured, or that the cause of general education suffers. At Yale, Harvard, Wilberforce, Cornell, Oberlin, the testimony is that both races get along well together. Nor is the South without such schools. In Madison, Kentucky, there is the Berea College, a notice of which I read from The American Missionary, for November 1873, pages 243 and 244. It reads as follows:

Less than thirteen years ago sixty-five armed men drew themselves up in line before Professor Rogers's house, close to the spot where now stands this new building, and notified the professors and trustees that they must leave the State within ten days. Less than six years ago half the whites left the school because black men were admitted to its privileges; but the white students came back in time, and some of those who participated in mobs are not ashamed now to be recognized as friends. * * * * * * * * * *

Here are gathered from twelve to fifteen hundred people from the mountains and from the Blue Grass country, literate and illiterate, rich and poor, white and colored, farmers, mechanics, and professional men; a very mingled crowd, but a very attentive and orderly audience.

It is an interesting sight, that large number under the green roof, listening eagerly through the morning and evening. But the fact that southern-born whites and blacks, in nearly equal proportion and in large numbers, have, for the past six years, recited together and in perfect harmony, makes this institution typical of what may be accomplished throughout the nation, and makes it of more than local importance. It requires no argument to show how much the colored people will be benefited by such an education. There is nothing like just such a school as this to teach mutual respect and forbearance, to dignify labor, to enforce a regard for the person and property of all classes, and to take away some of the arrogant supercilliousness of caste and race.

I also call attention to the following from the New York Independent, January 22, 1874, headed "Civil Rights and Yale College:"

Where the principles of impartiality have been brought to bear, whether in reference to schools, cars, churches, or hotels, there has always been first a huge outcry from the whole herd of white tyrants; then, upon the first trial, an ostentatious repugnance on the one hand, and a visible sensitiveness on the other, but finally both repugnance and sensitiveness forgotten in general acquiescence and oblivion. If Mr. HARRIS has forgotten it, will he please listen to a chapter in the history of Yale College?

In the year 1831 there was an effort put forth to secure a college for colored youth. At that time even the crumbs which fell from the mental boards of the various colleges were denied these people. It was proposed to locate this college in the city of New Haven. But when this plan became known a violent opposition at once arose. The officers of the city called a public meeting. The city-hall was densely packed, and the whole afternoon was given to the consideration of the matter. The following is the public record of the result:

"At a city meeting, duly warned and held in the city-hall, in the city of New Haven, on Saturday, September 10, 1831, to take into consideration a project for the establishment in this city of a college for the education of colored youth, the following preamble and resolutions were by said meeting adpted, namely:

"Whereas, in the opinion of this meeting, Yale College, the institutions for the education of females, and the other schools already existing in this city, are important to the community and the general interest of science, and as such have been deservedly patronized by the public; and the establishment of a college in the same place, to educate the colored population, is incompatible with the prosperity, if not the existence, of the present institutions of learning, and will be destructive of the best interests of the city: Therefore

"Resolved, by the mayor, aldermen, common council, and freemen of the city of New Haven in city meeting assembled, That we will resist the establishment of the proposed college in this place by every lawful means.

"DENNIS KIMBERLY, Mayor.

"ELISHA MONSON, Clerk."

It is needless to add that the danger was averted by this prompt and imposing array of force, and Yale College was saved to New Haven, and Connecticut, and the country. In 1831 the delicate nerves of Yale College could not endure the shock of seeing black boys educated a mile away; now she takes them to her own arms and bids them call her alma mater, and to our notion she looks quite as fair and buxom as ever. We are not a bit surprised to hear Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, talk in the same wild strain as did Mayor Kimberly in 1831; for we knew him to be forty-three years behind the times.

Again, the following from Old and New for February, 1874, a respectable monthly published in Boston, Massachusetts, and written by C. G. Fairchild, a writer not unknown to fame, will be read with interest by all thoughtful persons. It is headed "Non-proscriptive Schools in the South." The writer says:

The question of non-proscriptive schools at the South takes us at once to the fountain-head of a formative influence, to that which in itself begets force, which is noiseless and imperceptible, but which is as pervasive as sunlight, and as powerful to build up that against which tempests may waste their energies in vain. "Whatever you would have appear in a nation's life, that you must put into its schools," was long since a Prussian motto. Powerful as Prussia has proved this influence to be in fostering a love of country, it is far more powerful in the more subtile work of strengthening or allaying social prejudices. Are non-proscriptive schools, therefore, desirable; and can they be secured?

Few can understand, without careful and extended personal observation, how essentially different was the construction of society in the South from that in the North. It recognized two distinct classes—the laboring class and the cultured class; classes as distinct as the roots and the fruitage of a tree. The one class needed only the shelter of the hut, as the horse has his stable; for the other, no mansion within the reach of their means could be too spacious or elegant. Theoretically all labor was to be performed by slaves; while the fruits of labor were to raise to the highest culture and perfection the ruling class. Such a society had no place for an industrious, self-respecting middle class. Slave labor placed its own badge of servile degradation upon all labor. The white man whose hands were roughened in the strife for his daily bread was despised even by the negro slave. No southern conception was more natural than that northern society was composed of "mud-sills." Universal labor meant nothing else to them.

How, then, shall this exploded idea of civilization be overcome? In times past the negro race has been the exponent of labor at the South; and it is, for many years to come, to be closely associated with it. If, therefore, this race is to be separated from all others in the public schools, and even the youngest children are made to feel that the race is set apart for its special mission and destiny in society, how can we hope to make labor respectable? The old badge of servile degradation will attach to it not only for the black man but for the white man. To place blacks and whites in the same school is not to say that the races are equal or unequal. It is to animate all the individuals with a common purpose, with reference to which color or nationality has nothing to do. If color or nationality has anything to do with social affinities, non-proscriptive schools will not affect their natural and healthy influence. But color and nationality have nothing to do with labor. That is a matter of capacity and necessity. This fact a truly common-school system will impress constantly and effectively upon society, and thus relieve labor from a most unnatural and damning stigma put upon it by slavery.

The class distinctions perpetuated and taught by class schools infuse a detrimental influence into politics. Black men, no less than white men, should differ on public questions. But such difference cannot show itself in political action to any great extent as long as there is perpetuated a distinction so fundamental between the white man and the black as that the children of the latter cannot go to school with those of the former. In such a case class interests will predominate over those interests which are more general and less personal.

The same writer, in noticing an institution at Marysville, Tennessee, where black and white children and youths are taught, says:

If all the facts bearing upon this point could be collated, not only the enemies but the friends of non-proscriptive schools would be astonished.

Let the doors of the public-school house be thrown open to us alike, sir, if you mean to give these people equal rights at all, or to protect them in the exercise of the rights and privileges attaching to all freemen and citizens of our country.

THE COLORED VOTE.

It is true, sir, that these people, the colored people of our country, compose a very small minority of the American people, yet they contribute largely toward its industrial interests and at times play an important part in political affairs. For instance, President Grant's popular majority in the last presidential election was 762,991. The total colored vote is put down at 900,000. Now, allowing 10,000 of this vote to have been cast for Mr. Greeley, and 50,000 of these voters as not voting at all, which I am satisfied is in excess of the number of this class not voting, making 60,000, then deduct the 60,000 from the 900,000, and the result will show a colored vote polled of 840,000 for General Grant; yet the popular majority of General Grant as taken from the Tribune Almanac for 1873 was not more than 762,991, as already stated.

To the curious in such matters, and to those who seriously consider our institutions in this respect, this might be considered as not unworthy of a passing notice.

FINANCES.

Mr. WILBER. Mr. Speaker, having been largely engaged in business for many years past I have had some experience in the commercial interests of this country. The financial panic last fall has caused the members of this House to flood upon us many theories. I sometimes think that it is an utter impossibility to form any idea what will be done upon this question.

With this state of things existing, the West and the South are generally favoring more national banks, and many are for inflation. I have heard some wild schemes, very much wilder than I ever expected, and the inventors seem in earnest to carry them through. I fear too much legislation upon this subject.

Some inflationists say, "Give us twice as much currency." Others say, "Give us the $400,000,000 of legal-tenders, and no more." To do that would inflate to the amount of $17,000,000. I doubt the propriety of that, and think we have plenty of currency now.

I would not be in favor of issuing the $17,000,000 except upon one condition, and that to be discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury, as money can now be had at a low rate of interest—in case of a panic like that of last fall, and then the issue should only be temporary. I would only desire to have it in an emergency, to keep the wheels of industry in motion. I would so organize the finances as not to throw thousands of the laboring classes out of employment, and bring upon them destitution and starvation. I would prevent the breaking up of the best business firms of the country; and after the panic was over I would have the Secretary of the Treasury gradually retire the $17,000,000 from circulation, and not allow another dollar increase of paper under any other circumstances. For we should commence and take one step toward specie payment. The people have had the promise of it, and the republican party has pledged it in their conventions. The honor of this great and powerful country demands it. The question is, how are we going to do it?

Some say issue bonds, buy gold, and resume. No, sir; I would not issue another gold bond. Would we not owe the same amount of gold for the bonds we issued and sold; what better off would we be? This country does not possess the gold to buy the bonds, and they would have to find sale in a foreign market, where they now own too many of our bonds already. Would not the Government, being flush with money received from the sale of those bonds, invest it in different schemes that might be dispensed with, while the debt, both principal and interest, would have to be paid in gold to foreign nations where it was borrowed, and keep draining this country of the coin so much needed? Would not this be premature resumption? I would not issue another gold bond; not one. On the contrary, put a higher protective tariff on articles that could be manufactured in this country. Encourage the building up of manufactories to enrich the nation, and have the property so built help pay the taxes; and this would make more demand for labor, to be supported here instead of in Europe. We do not want to bring the price of labor here down on a par with labor in Europe. In this way we would soon have the balance of trade with foreign nations in our favor; and with the large product of our mines, together with the balance of trade in our favor, the coin of our country would rapidly increase.

This is my idea of inflation; to accumulate coin to add to the money we now have; to inflate with coin instead of paper, to keep pace with the growth of the nation, and in a short time we can resume specie payment with the same ease that the sun rises in the morning and moves on and upward until noonday. To the East, West, North, or South, that need national banks, give all they wish. In this liberal Government it was intended to give every man an equal chance and not favor any kind of monopolies. And in establishing new national banks under the same national banking laws that now exist for national banks, when currency is issued to those new banks have the Secretary of the Treasury retire the same amount of legal-tender notes as are issued to the new banks.

In fact, there are so many different ideas presented there is danger of doing too much. The country is now prosperous; we have passed over the panic of last fall; and I believe we cannot at this time make any better banking law than we now have. We have tried it. The people had more confidence in national-bank bills last fall than in banks or business firms. They chose rather to hoard them up than loan to banks or business firms with interest. Furthermore, I will guarantee that not a member here can tell what bank a single bill is on which he has in his pocket.

All this goes to show that the people ask no change. It is right as it is. We never look to see what bank issued the bill, whether it is North, South, East, or West; it makes no difference if we see that it is a greenback. You do not have to carry a bank-note detector in your pocket now.

One great question is to give us proper protection, so as to keep the balance of trade in our favor, and then the corn of our country will accumulate with the growth of this nation. If we continue on with this protection, with our well tried national-bank system under the laws as they now exist, giving the people new national banks where they are needed, not trying to do too much, under this management, without making new and dangerous experiments, with the rich growth of manufacturing interests, and with economical legislation, the rich products of our mines, and the large developments of our agricultural pursuits, and the great inducements for emigration to this country—I assure you if this policy is pursued and carried out it will cause us to grow richer in gold and more powerful than any other country in the whole world.

Mr. SPEER. I move the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 9, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. H. V. VOORHEES, D. D., of New York.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was dispensed with.

SENATOR FROM CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SARGENT presented the credentials of Hon. JOHN S. HAGER, chosen by the Legislature of California Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. Eugene Casserly.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. HAGER, he took his seat in the Senate.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the last day of the session of the Senate I entered a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate on the resolution for a joint committee relative to an investigation of the affairs of the District of Columbia. While I still think the Senate ought not to participate in the investigation of matters which may come before it in another capacity, involving the conduct of officers who are subject to impeachment, yet under the circumstances of this case I prefer to withdraw my motion rather than create delay, so that the committee may organize and proceed to discharge its business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion made by him on Friday to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the concurrent resolution in regard to an investigation of the affairs of this District. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a petition of a number of citizens of the State of Minnesota and Territory of Dakota, asking an appropriation for the improvement of the Red River of the North. To show the value and importance of that river, which is so remote, in the estimation of many Senators here, I will say that the petitioners state that fifteen million pounds of freight were shipped from Moorhead down said river by steamboats and barges during the boating season of the year 1872, and that the amount so shipped had increased to thirty million pounds during the boating season of 1873. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the memorial of the American Iron and Steel Association, adopted at its recent meeting in Philadelphia. It embraces a number of subjects, and so I have made an abstract as brief as I can. The memorialists pray for the repeal of section 2 of the act of June 6, 1872, which made a reduction of 10 per cent. upon duties; protest against the proposed amendment to the tariff laws excluding the cost of packages and shipping charges from the invoice value of foreign goods upon which duties are to be assessed, and allowing appraisers to take the cost of goods at the point of shipment as the basis of valuation; state themselves to be in favor of an amendment to the bankrupt law giving three-fourths of the creditors of an insolvent the right to control the settlement of his affairs; in favor of the omission of the tariff law from the schedule of the revised and codified laws of the United States until said tariff law is reformed by the repeal hereinbefore prayed for, by the conversion of ad valorem into specific duties, and the enlargement of the free list; or if the delay required for such reformation cannot be granted, praying that so much of the revised code as relates to duties may be examined by competent experts, and published for the information of the country before its final adoption; in favor of the creation of a department of industry, having for its head a cabinet officer, to be called the secretary of industry, and embracing bureaus of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; in favor of the limitation of the legal-tenders to $400,000,000; in favor of the repeal of the limitation upon currency, and the freedom of the banking circulation under national banking laws, subject to certain regulations; in favor of the consolidation of the national debt in a loan at a low rate of interest, which shall be the sole basis of banking, redeemable only by purchase in open market by Government; and praying for adherence to that general policy of protection to home industry which has made the nation powerful and its people prosperous.

The only subject in this memorial upon which action has been taken, I believe, is the bankrupt law. I therefore move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance, within whose cognizance the other topics properly come.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Rev. G. P. Tindall and ten other ministers of the gospel, residents of the State of Michigan, praying that the unappropriated portion of the Chinese indemnity fund be appropriated for the education of the Chinese in the Pacific States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa; which I ask may be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to appropriate money to indemnify the holders of pre-emption and homestead certificates and certificates of entry and patents upon lands in Iowa, within the so-called Des Moines River grant, on account of failure of title, &c.

Whereas there is now pending before Congress a bill having for its object the appropriation of the sum of $404,228 from the national Treasury to indemnify the holders of pre-emption certificates and certificates of entry and patents upon lands in Iowa within the so-called Des Moines River grant, on account of the failure of the title of said holders to said lands; and whereas said holders purchased said lands in good faith and for a valuable consideration from the General Government, and in good faith made permanent improvement thereon; and whereas the said holders of said certificates and occupiers of said lands have, without any fault of their own, been deprived, by the decision of Federal judiciary, of the titles to said lands, and have thereby suffered actual loss to the extent of the sum above specified in the aggregate, as appears by the report of the commissioners appointed by the President for the purpose of ascertaining such loss; and whereas we believe such report just and true, and that said holders of said certificates are justly and truly entitled to be indemnified: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, (first,) That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to earnestly support the bill recently introduced into the House of Representatives of the United States by the Hon. JACKSON ORR, entitled "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to indemnify the holders of pre-emption and homestead certificates and certificates of entry and patents upon lands in Iowa within the so-called Des Moines River grant, on account of failure of title, and to procure a relinquishment of the paramount title of the United States."

Resolved, (second,) That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, directed to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

JOSEPH DYSART,
President of the Senate.
JOHN H. GEAR,
Speaker of the House.

Approved February 3, 1874.

C. C. CARPENTER.

I hereby certify that this joint resolution originated in the senate.

J. A. T. HULL, Secretary.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I present a memorial of business men of the city of Tyler, Texas, approving the principle of the bankrupt law of the 2d of March, 1867, that the estate of an insolvent should, by law uniform throughout the United States, be divided equally among the creditors of the insolvent; and believing that a uniform rule should exist throughout the whole country for the prevention of frauds upon, and preferences among, creditors in cases of insolvency, and that a like uniform rule should prevail by which an honest insolvent may obtain a discharge from his debts, while agreeing that, in a number of its provisions, the law ought to be amended, respectfully remonstrate against the proposed repeal of the bankrupt law, and praying Congress to take action for the amendment of the same.

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present the petition of ship-masters and foreign vice-consuls at the port of Wilmington, North Carolina, suggesting the importance of certain improvements at the mouth of the river Cape Fear.

I may state that the city of Wilmington is one of the most prosperous and enterprising cities on our Atlantic sea-board. It is a great entrepôt for naval stores, and it is an extensive cotton and produce market, and has an extensive foreign and coastwise trade. It is not surprising, therefore, that the people there feel a great inte rest in the improvement of the mouth of the Cape Fear River. And because it is so important, I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I present the petition of William J. Patton, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of Arkansas, praying to be relieved from liability on account of embezzlements of certain deputy collectors. This petition is also accompanied by a certified copy of a petition signed by the governor of the State and several other State officers, in relation to the same subject. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of Mrs. Elizabeth Biggers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of a committee selected at a public meeting of the non-Mormon voters of Salt Lake City, held on the 19th of January, 1874, setting forth the grievances of the non-Mormons of Utah, and requesting such legislation by Congress as is needed for the full protection of all classes of people residing in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa; which was read, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed, namely:

Joint resolution in relation to the railroad bridge across the Mississippi River, at Clinton, Iowa.

Whereas all the railroad bridges across the Mississippi River are by law open to the use of all railroads desirous of using the same, except the railroad bridge at Clinton, Iowa, which is used exclusively by the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad; and whereas there are two lines of railroad on the east side of the Mississippi River desirous of crossing said bridge at Clinton and connecting with other railroads in this State, thereby increasing the facilities for transportation eastward of the farm products of this State to the greater advantage of the people thereof: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our honorable Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to use their utmost endeavors to obtain the early passage of an act providing for the opening of said railroad bridge at Clinton to the use of all railroads desirous of crossing the same, on payment of a just and reasonable compensation for such use.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolution be certified by the presiding officers of this General Assembly and copies thereof be forthwith forwarded to said Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JOSEPH DYSART,
President of the Senate.
JOHN H. GEAR,
Speaker of the House.

Approved February 3, 1874.

I hereby certify that this joint resolution originated in the senate.

J. A. T. HULL, Secretary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William D. Dorris, praying compensation for services rendered in the Army during the late war, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William J. Patton be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Finance.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. McCREERY. I ask to be excused from service on the Committee on Territories, and that my place be assigned to the Senator from California, [Mr. HAGER.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks the Senate to excuse him from service upon the Committee on Territories. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and he is excused. How shall the vacancy be filled?

Several SENATORS. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky nominates the Senator from California to fill the vacancy.

Mr. McCREERY. Let it be filled by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the nomination made by the Senator from Kentucky.

The nomination was agreed to; and Mr. HAGER was appointed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 332) granting to the American Fork Railway Company a right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Charles B. Signor, of Earlville, Illinois, praying for a pension on account of the causeless shooting away of his right arm by a soldier, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 172) granting a pension to Michael McGrayel, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Rufus Mead, United States consul at San Juan del Sur, praying compensation for services rendered in the absence of C. N. Riotte, minister near the government of Nicaragua, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of William M. Kimball; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 456) for the sale of the Black Bob Indian lands, in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 457) to abrogate and declare void a certain portion of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 458) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make compensation for certain services therein mentioned; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of William J. Patton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask leave to introduce a bill to amend section 3 of an act making appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1872, in relation to the holding of circuit courts by judges other than the judge appointed or specially assigned to that circuit. I wish to say that this bill is not of my own framing, and I introduce it at the request of one of the district attorneys of the United States, an eminent lawyer; and that I do not hold myself at all responsible for anything it contains, and I will advocate it or oppose it, as I find it deserves to be advocated or opposed.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 460) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872," approved March 3, 1871; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 461) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 462) to further amend an amendatory act, approved March 2, 1867, amending an act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts," approved July 27, 1866; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 463) supplementary to "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 464) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

STATUE OF GEORGE CLINTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 6, 1874.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a copy of a communication, dated the 22d ultimo, received from the governor of the State of New York, in which it is announced that, in accordance with the invitation of Congress, as expressed in the act approved July 2, 1864, that State now presents for acceptance a bronze statue of George Clinton, deceased, one of its distinguished citizens.

U. S. GRANT.

The message was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EAST TENNESSEE UNIVERSITY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first case on the Calendar.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of the East Tennessee University; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Treasurer of the United States to pay to the president of the East Tennessee University the sum of $18,500, in full compensation for aid given by and on behalf of the university to the Army of the United States in the late war of the rebellion; but before this sum shall be paid, a release in full of all claims against the Government by the East Tennessee University is to be executed in due form by the proper officers thereof, and deposited with the Treasurer, along with the receipt for the money hereby appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any report accompanying the bill? I should like to hear the bill explained if there is no report. There should be a report.

Mr. COOPER. There is no report, I believe, with the present bill. Reports have been presented with the bill at prior sessions, and I will submit those reports if the Senator from Vermont desires it. There is no written report, I understand, with the present bill. The bill was passed at two prior sessions of the Senate unanimously, and I have the reports that were then made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have one of them read, to explain what the circumstances are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no report accompanying the bill, because I presumed that the Senate understood the bill. It is one that has been before them at previous sessions. It passed both Houses of Congress at the last session, but was not signed by the President on account of the language in the body of the bill speaking of a claim for damages. The bill was sent back to Congress with a suggestion, I suppose by the Attorney-General, that it should be put in a certain form of language and it would then comply with the theory of the Administration in reference to allowing the claim. The bill was again referred to the Military Committee at this session for examination, and I think it was reported by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH.] On the examination of the bill in the committee the committee came to the conclusion that the damage done was in the nature of a tort, and that the Government was liable, and therefore reported the bill; and it stands on the report made in the House of Representatives. There is no written report of our committee with this bill. It is a claim for the destruction of property after the taking possession of the university buildings, and also for the occupancy of the buildings by the troops. The Government owes for the occupancy in the nature of rent, as the buildings belonged to persons who were not inimical to the Government. We proceeded upon the ground that the claim was in the nature of rent so far as the occupation of the property was concerned and in the nature of a tort so far as the destruction of the property was concerned. Instruments and things of that kind belonging to the university were destroyed. In that view, we reported the bill, and think it is proper to be passed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask the Senator if this is the same bill substantially that passed the House twice and the Senate once?

Mr. LOGAN. It is the same bill, merely changing the phraseology. It is for the same purpose as the bill that passed the House, and would have been signed by the President if the phraseology had been different. The phraseology has now been changed to conform to the view of the President.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That was my understanding; but I wanted to be confirmed by the chairman of the Military Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont still desire to have the report read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. WILSON to the Senate on the 17th of January, 1872:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of the East Tennessee University, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

It appears that the seven university buildings, and the grounds adjacent thereto, came into the occupation of the United States military authorities in good condition, in September, 1863, and were occupied by them for military purposes until June 13, 1865; that, during this occupation, one of the buildings was totally demolished, and the others were so materially damaged as to render them wholly unfit for use; that the library, scientific apparatus, mineralogical and geological cabinets were destroyed; that the fences, trees, shrubbery, &c., were nearly all removed and burned, and that the grounds were mutilated and greatly injured by earthworks, a fort and rifle-pits being thereupon.

The East Tennessee University is believed to be particularly deserving of the favorable consideration of Congress. It is the only educational institution of known loyalty, in management and influence, in any of the seceding States during the war. It is situated at Knoxville, in the center of East Tennessee, and is surrounded by a population known for their loyalty and sacrifices to the cause of the Union.

The committee recommend the payment to the university of the sum of $18,500.

The CHIEF CLERK. There is another report, made previously, at the Forty-first Congress, third session.

Mr. COOPER. That is the same in substance as the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the report which has just been read the first or second?

The CHIEF CLERK. The one just read is the last one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the first one.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. Abbott to the Senate on the 17th of January, 1871:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of the East Tennessee University, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

It appears that the seven university buildings, and the grounds adjacent thereto, came into the occupation of the United States military authorities in good condition in September, 1863, and were occupied by them for military purposes until June 13, 1865; that, during this occupation, one of the buildings was totally demolished, and the others were so materially damaged as to render them wholly unfit for use; that the library, scientific apparatus, mineralogical, and geological cabinets were destroyed; that the fences, trees, shrubbery, &c., were nearly all removed and burned; and that the grounds were mutilated and greatly injured by earthworks, a fort and rifle pits being thereupon.

The East Tennessee University is believed to be particularly deserving of the favorable consideration of Congress. It is the only educational institution of known loyalty, in management and influence, in any of the seceding States during the war. It is situated at Knoxville, in the center of East Tennessee, and is surrounded by a population known for their loyalty and sacrifices to the cause of the Union.

In every respect is this case considered entitled to early and generous consideration. The action of the House of Representatives in passing a bill for the relief of the Sisters of our Lady of Mercy, of Charleston, South Carolina, and that of this committee in their favorable report on the same, indicates a disposition to favorably act upon these cases of public nature which are meritorious.

The committee recommend the payment to the university of the sum of $18,500, and report back the bill with amendment to that effect.

Repairs of six buildings	$15,000

Mr. WRIGHT. I want to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee, and to the Senate also, that a number of cases involving questions very similar to the one involved in this report, and of a class to which this belongs, I think I am justified in saying are before the Committee on Claims. They have them now under consideration. It has been the intention of that committee, I think I am justified in saying—though the chairman is here, and he can correct me if I am wrong—to hold a meeting at some time so as to take up the entire question, and to devote such time to it that we can go over the whole subject. I suggest that, in view of this fact, it would be well that this bill should be passed over until we have had opportunity to examine the whole question and make a report upon it. The report as it stands now, notwithstanding the bill passed the Senate and may have passed the House at the last session, does not seem to discuss some questions that are before the Committee on Claims at this time. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs also, that while, of course, there is no disposition to do anything that would seem to take this out of their hands, for myself, as an individual, I should prefer that this bill go over—and I think that is the feeling of others also—until we have examined and reported upon the question and got the whole matter before the Senate, so that we may understand what we are doing before we pass upon this bill.

Mr. COOPER. Of course I have no disposition to press the passage of the bill now if it is objected to seriously upon any question involved in it; but I submit to the honorable Senator from Iowa that the Committee on Claims at the last session did report upon the very questions which he now suggests, which were embodied in a lengthy printed report by the then chairman of that committee, discussing the whole ground in answer to the veto message of the President in the Best case. I suppose those are the questions which the Senator from Iowa now desires to have re-examined. I think if he will examine the present case he will find that it does not fall within the objection urged against the Best case, because the Best case was a destruction by reason of a military necessity. There was no such necessity in the case of the East Tennessee University. It falls within the class of cases of the Kentucky University, a bill for the relief of which was passed several sessions ago and approved by the President. I do not see any reason for postponing the bill. We are very anxious that it should be acted upon and passed. It has now been pending for many years before Congress. It has passed both Houses of Congress at different times. It has passed the Senate twice, and passed the House of Representatives once.

Mr. SCOTT. I was not in when the report was read in this case, and am not apprised of the exact nature of the case or of the question that is involved in it; but the Senator from Iowa is certainly correct in saying that there are now pending before the Committee on Claims a number of cases which will bring before the Senate the whole question involved, in many cases presenting various aspects of the liability of the Government for property taken, as well as property destroyed, in the late insurrectionary States. While I do not know the exact nature of the question raised by this report from the Military Committee, I think I can say to my friend from Tennessee that any case involving this question in any of its phases will not be at all likely to be disposed of in the morning hour. It will give rise to a discussion that I am satisfied will put over any case in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee consent that the bill be laid aside?

Mr. COOPER. I would rather not.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not consent to it.

Mr. WADLEIGH. As the member of the Committee on Military Affairs who reported this bill, I have been watching for some legal objection to its passage, but have heard none. As I understand it, the bill provides for payment to this university by the Government for the use of the real estate of the university which was taken and held by the Government in the course of the war. This property, for the use of which payment is asked, was not destroyed in the course of warlike operations; it was not used in the course of warlike operations. Its destruction and its use were not matters of military necessity, but matters of convenience. The Government of the United States took possession of this property of the university for the use of its Army in that quarter. It was used by the Government; and for the use of that property by the Government in that way, and for the particular use of it which resulted in the destruction of a certain part of it, the university asks the Government to pay.

I am not aware that there can be any objection to the payment of this claim. We all know that the section of country in which this university is located was loyal to the Government; that this university itself was loyal to the Government; and the Government, not in the course of military operations, not as a matter of military necessity, but as a matter of convenience, took possession of this real estate; it had the use of it; and it appeared to the committee that the sum named in the bill was a fair price for the use that was made of that real estate and the property of the university.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the sum?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Eighteen thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask one question: whether, immediately before it was taken possession of by the United States, it was within our lines or within the lines of the enemy?

Mr. COOPER. What is the question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask whether immediately before it was taken possession of by the United States this institution was within our lines or within the lines of the enemy?

Mr. COOPER. It was within the confederate lines up to the capture of Knoxville by General Burnside. That was shortly before it was taken. At the time it was taken possession of it was within our lines.

Mr. MORTON. It seems to me this case is very broadly distinguished from the Best case in Kentucky. This property was not taken in the conflict or crash of battle; it was not destroyed or used in that way; but was deliberately appropriated to the use of the Government in the way of barracks. It bears no resemblance to the Best case, and I can see no objection to the payment of the claim.

Mr. LOGAN. The point here, as suggested by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from New Hampshire, is very different from the question raised in the Best case. There compensation was objected to because the property of Best was destroyed in actual battle.

Mr. MORTON. That was the point.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a broad distinction between such a case as that and this. This property was used by the troops, not by taking possession of it from the enemy, but possession was taken from loyal persons occupying it, and then it was used by the troops who occupied it. Hence the Military Committee agreed that for this use and occupation the Government of the United States was liable, on the principle that they had used and occupied the property for the purposes of the Government, and had not used or occupied or destroyed it in the course of war in battle, or where it was an obstruction to military operations. We agreed, therefore, that the parties were entitled to their charge for the use and occupation of this property, and also for the damages which accrued from the use and occupation to the material that was in the possession of the parties within the houses that were used, such as their scientific apparatus and things of that kind. Looking at it in that aspect, for the destruction of a portion of the property in the nature of a tort we decided that the Government was liable.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senate for one moment to the fact that the Committee on Claims, of which my friend from Iowa is a member, reported a bill precisely of this character for the Lexington University, in Kentucky. I believe it was reported by the chairman of the committee favorably, and it passed this Senate, allowing $25,000 for precisely such a claim as this. That precedent takes the case entirely out of the purview and meaning that has been given to "destruction of property in war" by the discussion heretofore had in the Senate on the report of the Committee on Claims.

I agree with the Committee on Claims that where property is destroyed during war, in the course of hostile operations or in battle, of necessity, then the Government is not liable; but where they take, use, and occupy property for the purposes of the Government when it is in the possession of loyal persons and belonging to them, not in the course of actual military operations, then the Government is liable for the use and occupation of the property. I believe that is clear, good law, and will be so held; and that is the ground precisely on which this claim is based, following the precedent reported by my friend the chairman of the Committee on Claims. I hope that the Kentucky claim will not be made an exception to the rule, and this institution, the only one in my judgment that can claim to have been strictly loyal to the Government of the United States within the lines of the confederate army at any time, made to suffer. I should hate very much that the Senate should allow the claim of the Kentucky University, and refuse this claim for the Knoxville University, when they are based on precisely the same legal status.

Mr. SCOTT. Since I was on the floor before I have read the report in this case; and lest what I said at that time, suggesting the probability of a discussion carrying the bill through the morning hour might be considered as hostile to the bill, I now desire to say that, from the report heretofore made in the case, which I have read, I cannot distinguish between this case and the case just referred to by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs—that in which compensation was given to the Kentucky University at Lexington. It is true the circumstances were not altogether the same, but the principle involved is the same. In the case of the Kentucky University, it had been occupied for quarters by the troops, a chemical laboratory used for a kitchen, and so carelessly used that the building while occupied by the United States troops was destroyed by fire. A large medical museum that was in the building was destroyed also by that fire, or by the effort to remove it. And the committee reported—I think I made the report myself in that case—compensation for the value of the building destroyed and such part of the medical museum as was destroyed, amounting in all to $25,000.

It does not bring up the question which has heretofore been mooted in the Senate, and which is now, as my friend from Iowa intimates, rather in abeyance in the Committee on Claims, as to the extent the Government ought to pay loyal owners in territory that was, at least for a part of the time, insurrectionary. I made the report in that case, and I have always voted with those who deemed it the duty of the Government to pay unmistakably loyal men for their property, taken in the disloyal States; and supposing that the Military Committee have made full investigation into this case, and that the amount which they report is a just amount, I shall feel justified in pursuing the course I have heretofore pursued, and following that committee and voting for this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to add but a word to what I said before. I would not have my friend from Tennessee, or any person, suppose that in what I said I was hostile to this bill. I think this is one of a class of cases, however, where it is incumbent upon us to move very slowly, and to be sure we are right before we go ahead. It has been suggested that a report was made at the last session, and a bill passed very similar to this. It must be remembered that one-third of the members of this body have changed since then. It must be remembered also that while that report came from the Committee on Claims, the organization of that committee has changed also, and that that bill was vetoed, as I understand. It occurred to me that in view of the question that was involved in this case and its importance—not the mere sum that is involved, but its importance as a precedent, inasmuch as it looks to the drawing of money out of the Treasury for the purposes contemplated in this bill, and will be followed beyond all question by a number of other bills that are now before committees of this body—it was perhaps just and right to ourselves that we should hold the bill for the present until we get reports on the various questions involved.

I am very sure that I would not be understood at all as indicating that the Committee on Military Affairs should be withheld in their action by the action of the Committee on Claims; but I merely submit the fact that the matter is now before us, and that the whole question be held in abeyance, as has been suggested. We shall have a report upon it in a very short time, and I think we shall perhaps be better able to dispose of the entire question than if we undertook to decide the bill now; and yet if this bill is pressed, in view of the action of the Senate heretofore, I am not prepared to say that I shall oppose it. I only suggest, as a matter of caution, in view of the amount that is involved by the precedent being established, we should go slowly, and not pass this bill until we have had an opportunity to investigate the whole question.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought it was moved by the Senator from Iowa that this bill should be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand him to make a motion. He made a suggestion to that effect.

Mr. WRIGHT. I did not make a motion, but I suggested to the Senator from Tennessee and others that that would be the better course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the question is to be considered now, I should like to hear the message of the President on that bill read, and to make some other inquiries of the gentleman who reported it. Of course it is a very important matter indeed, and justice ought to be done to this institution, but we ought to know the precise circumstances, which this report, as it seems to me, does not show, under which this property was taken. If it was taken under one set of circumstances, then we clearly ought to pay for the use of it. If it was taken under another set of circumstances, then as clearly we are not liable, unless you make it a gratuity merely, choosing to give away the money of the Treasury to this institution; but that is an entirely different question. As a matter of justice and right, the institution under one set of circumstances would not have any claim on the Government, and under another it would have.

Now, the report merely states that we took possession. How? Why? What was the urgency at the moment? Whether it was to protect the town from the assaults of the enemy, or what it was, what the stress was of the circumstances which would throw it one side of the line or the other, we are not informed. The committee can, no doubt, get at the precise facts, and then upon the precise facts we voting shall know that while we are doing justice to this institution we shall not be establishing a precedent upon which we shall be called upon to go much further than we intended.

My only present objection is that the report does not show the details of the circumstances and the occasion on which this possession was taken. It only says we took possession. I am not blaming the committee of the Senate about it. They took the House report in the pressure of their affairs, as it was very natural they should.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see how we could detail the circumstances. It was not taken possession of in battle. It was taken possession of by the commanding officer to be occupied by the troops, the same as any house would be taken possession of. That is very clearly shown. It was for the use of the troops there, the same as commissary stores or quartermaster stores. It was taken possession of and occupied by the troops. That is very clearly set forth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is true the report states that it was taken possession of and occupied by the troops. So was Richmond, so was Libby, and so were a variety of places that hard fighting enabled us to get into. It was hard fighting indeed, because we had the same race and the same valor on both sides; but that would not prove that it would be a good ground of claim. If this university was in contest between two armies, as the Bishop's palace was at Monterey, I take it there would scarcely be a claim on either side to have it paid for. The difficulty I have with this report is not, as my friend might imagine, from what he has last said, with any view to criticise the action of the committee, but that we are not informed of the precise circumstances under which this property was occupied by the troops. These reports were made most of them from the House of Representatives, as we are told; but I do submit to him that they fail to show the circumstances of the case. They say that some property was destroyed; that buildings were taken possession of and occupied; but I wish to know where the enemy's troops were then; I wish to know where the military lines were then; I wish to know what had been going on during that week, and what did go on during the next, and so on. If this city was within our lines and we occupied it with a large army, and found occasion with a view to military operations further on to occupy this university in the ordinary course, as we did a fair-ground in Indiana, and another somewhere further south I believe, that would make one case. But if when these armies were struggling for Knoxville, one being in one day and the other another in the contest of arms, it might have been that this university got injured, as it was stated to have been injured in the discussion last year, damaged by the troops of the United States in the course of war, where there would be no just ground of claim. It might be also under similar circumstances that it was merely occupied as by rental, as I think my friend said, or something of that kind.

What I wish to have on record is a statement in writing from the committee, so that there shall be no dispute hereafter as to precisely these various circumstances which throw this case to the one side or the other of the line. Having that, then I am sure, as we pretty much all agree now about the principle of the thing, we should not have any more difficulty, probably, in determining the case. That was the suggestion I made, but it was not in any spirit of complaining of the committee, but in the spirit of desiring to learn more of the special circumstances that surrounded this transaction than are stated in the report.

I should like to have the message of the President of the United States read on this subject and last year's bill, so as to see the difference between the two propositions.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to discuss the matter further. I have said all I care to say about the bill. It has been thoroughly examined and reported on, twice passed the House, once passed the House and Senate, once been thoroughly discussed, and I do not desire to rediscuss it. I am only sorry that it did not come either from the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Claims, so that it could be thoroughly investigated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The veto message of the President of the United States will be read, at the request of the Senator from Vermont.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 29, 1873.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill No. 490, entitled "An act for the relief of the East Tennessee University," without my approval.

This claim, for which $18,500 are appropriated out of the moneys of the United States, arises in part for the destruction of property by troops in time of war, and therefore the same objections attach to it as were expressed in my message of June 1, 1872, returning the Senate bill awarding $25,000 to J. Milton Best.

If the precedent is once established that the Government is liable for the ravages of war, the end of demands upon the public Treasury cannot be forecast.

The loyalty of the people of the section in which the university is located, under circumstances of personal danger and trials, thus entitling them to the most favorable construction of the obligation of the Government toward them, is admitted; and nothing but regard for my duty to the whole people, in opposing a principle which, if allowed, will entail greater burdens upon the whole than the relief which will be afforded to a part by allowing this bill to become a law, could induce me to return it with objections.

Recognizing the claims of these citizens to sympathy, and the most favorable consideration of their claims by the Government, I would heartily favor a donation of the amount appropriated by this bill for their relief.

U. S. GRANT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I should like to hear the bill read which was vetoed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An act for the relief of the East Tennessee University.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the trustees of the East Tennessee University the sum of $18,500, in full compensation for all claims which could be made by said university for all damages caused to its buildings at Knoxville, Tennessee: Provided, That before said sum shall be paid a release in full of all claims against the Government for all damages that might or could be claimed by said East Tennessee University on account of said buildings shall be executed in due form by the proper officers of said university, and deposited with the Treasurer, along with the receipt for the money hereby appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to apologize to my good-natured friend from Illinois, who regrets extremely that this bill did not come from the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Claims, so that it would have been investigated. I am sorry that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is so belligerent still so long after the war that he is disposed to receive the slightest inquiry upon a subject that he reports, and the slightest observation upon a report which he himself, to be sure, did not make, as it is printed, as an offense to him or his committee. Certainly no such offense was intended; and I hope my friend will not feel in precisely the spirit that he seemed to do when he made that remark. I am sure that every committee is perfectly willing to receive the fair and just inquiry which has been made about this bill without complaining of it. I am sure that no committee that I know of has done more for the benefit of the people than the Committee on Military Affairs; and if its chairman can lower his war colors a little, so as to submit, as all other committees have to do, to a little inquiry and to a little discussion, without feeling particularly angry about it, possibly we shall get on better.

Now, Mr. President, having apologized for having said so much as I have, I only wish to remark that it is a curious circumstance, after all, that we are to change this law, not because the facts have changed, not because the case of the University of East Tennessee is any different this year than it was last, but we are expected to overcome an executive veto by changing the phraseology of the story that we tell about the same facts. That is the thing that puzzles me upon the passage of this bill. If, as I said, we were permitted to get at the facts about it, so that I could know that it fell within what has been stated, as a rental occupation, I should vote for it with pleasure, assuming that the Committee on Military Affairs has provided the proper and just sum, as I do; but not knowing what the precise state of affairs was, and not venturing to make any further inquiry of the chairman, certainly I shall feel obliged, if we are forced to vote now, to withhold my vote from it.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the time will be extended for five minutes. Senators, I suppose, have accomplished what they desire, as the morning hour is about to expire.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will give my friend full opportunity to go on with this bill as long as he likes.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I certainly feel very sorely criticised by my friend from Vermont for having made remarks which he thinks were out of place. I submit to his superior experience in the mode and manner of conducting matters in this Senate to my own, and hence I feel, of course, that I should not have said what I did, inasmuch as he says that I ought not. I only said that I was sorry the bill did not go to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Claims, and I am. I do not take that back, because those committees are composed of experienced and able lawyers, and we should have had a report from them, probably, that would have been intelligible to the Senate. But I am surprised that my friend from Vermont should feel so annoyed at all times if any person says a word to him. He is the most pleasant gentleman in the Senate. He never says anything to anybody that is cutting, or sharp, or incisive. He is the kindest, most good-natured, modest, sensitive man in the Senate Chamber. He deals in such gentle phrase that you would think honeyed words were dropping from his lips at all times; and when he is so generous and so kind to his colleagues, it is very strange that they cannot be equally kind and generous toward him. Hence, feeling that I did say something on the moment that was unpleasant to him, I withdraw it as a matter of course, and hope the Senate will act on the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 40, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Clayton, Cooper, Crozier, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Spencer, Stockton, Sumner, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—40.

So the bill was passed.

A bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of Friday last, being House bill No. 792.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. THURMAN to amend the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary by inserting as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the office of register in bankruptcy is hereby abolished, and the several district courts shall make such orders and take such steps as may be necessary to adjudicate and dispose of all suits, matters, or proceedings in bankruptcy now pending before such registers. The several district courts shall have power, where it may appear to be necessary or advisable, to appoint special master-commissioners to perform any of the duties heretofore performed by registers; and this power may also be exercised by a judge of said courts at chambers. No fees or compensation shall be paid to any such commissioner except such as shall be allowed by the court upon consideration of his bill; and no such fees or compensation shall in any case exceed the amount heretofore allowed for like services.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, when this amendment was offered on Friday last I called the attention of Senators to the nature and importance of it. I do not desire to repeat what I said in that connection when I offered it, but will reserve anything further that I may have to say on the subject until after the views of Senators who are opposed to the amendment may have been presented.

It is known to the Senate that one of the pieces of machinery, so to speak, of the present bankrupt law is what is called a register in bankruptcy, and that by a provision of the law the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States was authorized to appoint as many registers in bankruptcy as in his judgment it was necessary or advisable to appoint; and that in the exercise of that power he appointed a register in each congressional district of the United States. There may have been here and there a congressional district in which no register was appointed, but I am not aware of a single one in which a register was not appointed by the late Chief Justice.

The law further provides that the district court may dismiss these registers when there is no use for them, but that power has not been exercised, I believe, in any instance; at least no such instance has come to my knowledge; and one reason why it has not been exercised, and one reason why it will not be exercised, I take to be this, without disrespect to those district judges: that this office of register relieves the district judges from work, which, were there no such office, they themselves would have to perform, and which they ought to perform in at least three-fourths of the districts in the United States, having ample time to perform that duty.

There is but one opinion in respect to the cost of these bankrupt proceedings, and that is that no feature of this bankrupt law increases the cost as much as the existence of the register in bankruptcy; for they are a kind of court holding sessions and entitled to a per diem for each day they sit in any bankrupt case; and as that day's sitting may be, in point of fact, but a very brief space of time occupied with that case, and they may adjourn it from time to time, and time to time, it is alleged that that court is resorted to and that their per diem is thus piled up in a case in the most unreasonable and unjustifiable manner.

Mr. MORTON. What do you propose?

Mr. THURMAN. As I said before, in three-fourths of the district courts of the United States the judge himself can perform the duties that are now performed by the registers; but if, for the ease of the parties, on account of their distance from the place where the court sits or the judge lives, or on account of the complicated nature of the case, if for any such reason as that, any one of the reasons that would influence a chancellor to appoint a master-commissioner to audit accounts or take testimony, or investigate a case or make a report, such appointment is advisable, the bankrupt court may do precisely what a chancellor does in an equity case; he may appoint a special master-commissioner for that particular case; and then my amendment provides, and it would be so without any such provision, that special master-commissioner's costs and allowances must be audited and taxed by the court itself. There being no statutory fees for master-commissioners, each master-commissioner must make report to the court, and my amendment expressly provides that he shall do so, and that he shall receive no compensation except such as upon an audit by the court shall be allowed to him by order of the court. I believe that if that were done it would lessen the expenses very greatly indeed in these cases; at least that is the opinion, as I said the other day, of some of the most eminent and highest Federal judges that there are in this country, as well as of some eminent district judges who are willing to work hard.

I know that this amendment proposes a very great change in the law; and that it will be said in opposition to it that the existence of a register in bankruptcy in every congressional district is very much for the ease and convenience of parties; but if there is anything at all in this great clamor of estates being wasted by exorbitant charges, by collusion between officers in the administration of the estates; if those charges have any validity whatever—and we have heard them repeated again and again by Senators, sometimes from their own knowledge and at other times upon information that they deemed reliable—if those charges, I say, are well founded, then I know of no better way to get at the evil than to abolish these quasi intermediate courts called registers in bankruptcy, and compel the judges of the district courts to perform these duties where they can, and, where they cannot, authorize them to appoint a special master-commissioner, having reference to his fitness and his integrity, to discharge the duty, and auditing his accounts and allowing only what is proper.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the argument which is urged in favor of this amendment, and the only one, is that it will diminish the expense in matters of bankruptcy. I think it is very clear that it will increase the expense. Every litigant who would go into the district court must appear there by feed counsel, while in a great many matters and motions which he wishes to bring to the attention of registers he can appear in person. Therefore it would be a very decided increase in the expense of administering this law if we required all the proceedings to be had before the court; and then in addition would be the expense of being obliged to go from one end of the State to the other where the district court was located, instead of having a register and his office in every congressional district in the United States.

As to the argument that the objection to the present bankrupt law is the exorbitant charges, we have already met that difficulty by reducing the fees of the registers one-half. The idea of appointing a commission where the court could not attend to the case has this objection: these registers were appointed seven years ago; they have seven years' experience; and to take the administration of this law from them and give it to those who are mere novices would certainly not be advisable. I think that this amendment, if adopted, would derange the whole bankrupt business of the country.

I assume that there is nothing in the suggestion which was made by my friend, the chairman of this committee, the Senator from Vermont, that these registers are sought to be got rid of because their political sentiments are not agreeable to all parties. I take it for granted that there is nothing in that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT. I just wish to add one word. It seems to me that in addition to what the Senator from New Jersey has said by way of objection to this amendment, there is another one. We give to the judge the power to appoint these special commissioners. Instead of having an officer who is well acquainted with all his duties under the law, as has been suggested, we pick up new men from time to time, and we not only have a new man for each case but for each question as it may arise. The consequence will be that the time of the court will be taken up day after day with applications for the appointment of these special commissioners; and instead of having one person to discharge the duties, and better enabled to discharge them also, for a reasonable compensation, we have men appointed to discharge a special duty; and my experience is that as you appoint these men and increase them, you necessarily increase expenses; and my opinion is that when you have got these special commissioners under the proposed arrangement, instead of reducing the expenses of the administration of the bankrupt law, you will increase them largely.

Not only is that so, Mr. President, but the registers as now appointed have been appointed because of their known fitness, or supposed fitness, at least, for the positions they occupy. When questions are raised before the district court with reference to the appointment of special commissioners, it is impossible that the district judge shall be able to investigate the character of those commissioners as they are presented; it is impossible for him to tell whether they may not have some connection with the questions that are raised, or be so interested in the questions as that they would be the last persons who should be appointed for the position. Of course the judge makes these appointments necessarily hurriedly. He has to examine them hurriedly in court. He cannot investigate the character of the man proposed, and he cannot tell what connection he may have with the questions that are involved in the particular case; and the consequence will be, I think, that you will find that case after case will arise where there will be charges of fraud or improper conduct against these commissioners, and that they were interested in the questions which they were deciding. I think it were better in the administration of justice with reference to this law, as well as in the administraton of all laws, that you have officers who are permanent, who have been appointed because of their general fitness, than that you leave the law so as that there shall be a number of officers appointed from time to time.

One more word. Under one amendment as it stands now in a section that was adopted when we adjourned on Friday, it is competent for the judge to consolidate these offices and devolve the duties that pertain now to the several officers all upon one, or at least to consolidate them so as to avoid expense and prevent delay. I think that power is all that is necessary under this law at present.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, let us see for one moment which mode would most likely secure the services of a most competent and faithful man, that proposed in my amendment, or the existing law.

How were these registers in bankruptcy appointed, and when were they appointed? They were appointed in the city of Washington, by the Chief Justice of the United States, for the whole territory of the United States. About, in round numbers, three hundred of them were appointed. How many of these registers were personally known to the Chief Justice who appointed them? I do not suppose one in fifty was personally know to him. He could have had, therefore, no personal knowledge of their fitness. He had to appoint them upon recommendations, in most instances got up by persons aspiring to hold the office and reap its emoluments, ex parte recommendations in regard to their fitness, of which the Chief Justice making the appointments had very little opportunity to judge, and scarcely any to scrutinize. Indeed, I have reason to know that the Chief Justice did not pass upon many of these appointments, except simply to say in the end, "Let the man be appointed;" but gave to a subordinate, a clerk, or a friend, the bushels of recommendations that were poured in upon him, let him abstract them and give his opinion, which in most instances the Chief Justice approved. He could not do otherwise. I am told that the recommendations that poured in upon him amounted to thousands and thousands for this office.

Now, as to the fitness of the persons appointed, as to their knowledge of the law. Mark it, as these registers were appointed before there was a single case in bankruptcy, appointed immediately upon the passage of the bill, they were not then persons who were skilled in the bankrupt law. Not one of them, perhaps, before his appointment, had ever read the bankrupt law; and many of them had no more idea of what a bankrupt law was than they had of the provisions of the Koran, so that there was no peculiar fitness of these men which caused their appointment. The Chief Justice did the best he could. He did as well as any man could do in making his appointments; but in the very nature of things it must be that he must have appointed many unfit men for that position.

But how is it when a court appoints a master-commissioner in a case? Every lawyer knows that nothing is done, generally speaking, with more discretion and more judgment, and that the parties look to with more interest, than the appointment of a master-commissioner in equity; and it would be precisely the same in bankruptcy. The parties would see that a good and proper man was appointed, and the court would see; for it is a court in the locality, knowing the bar of the State or district in which it is held, familiar with the reputation of lawyers, and with the reputation and ability of many of the citizens. You would have, therefore, an appointing power at home, acquainted with the facts necessary to the making of a good appointment.

But, sir, I have only to say once more, in regard to the cost of this proceeding, that I prepared this amendment at the suggestion of two of the highest judges in this country, one of whom said to me in emphatic language, "You never will materially reduce the expenses in bankruptcy until you abolish the registers." He may be wrong. The judges to whom I have alluded may be wrong. That is their opinion, and they are better qualified to judge of the effect of the proposed amendment than I am. I am inclined to think they are right. Instead of a case going ex necessitate, or as a matter of course, to a register in bankruptcy, I want the judge to decide upon the questions in that case, unless it is of such a character that it ought to be referred to a master-commissioner. As to what was said by the Senator from New Jersey, that that would increase the expenses, by compelling parties to employ counsel, because the proceedings were in court, I do not think that is so. In regard to all those matters, which are mere matters of course, which require no argument at all, the parties can just as well appear before a judge as they can appear before a register, if they see fit to do so; and in respect to those questions which are law questions, which have to be argued, they must employ counsel, whether the case is heard by a register or whether it is heard by the judge.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I very much doubt the propriety of this amendment upon examination. It is no doubt true that when the registers in bankruptcy were first appointed many of them were not well qualified, and were quite ignorant of proceedings of that character; but the presumption is that the experience they have had has reasonably well qualified them; and the lawyers who may be picked up about the court to be appointed as special commissioners, unless they have had large practice in bankruptcy, which is not to be presumed, would be less qualified than these registers, who have been engaged in the business now for some years. So the Senator's proposition really amounts to turning out a body of experienced officers, who have had large experience, and trusting the business to special commissioners, appointed from time to time, the most of whom perhaps have had little to do with the bankrupt law, and do not know much about it; because a lawyer in full practice cannot take an appointment of that kind, and will not do it.

But, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the concluding provision of his amendment:

> No fees or compensation shall be paid to any such commissioner except such as shall be allowed by the court upon consideration of his bill; and no such fees or compensation shall in any case exceed the amount heretofore allowed for like services.

That will certainly defeat that provision of the bill cutting down the fees one-half, because it allows the special commissioner to have compensation, in the discretion of the court, not to exceed that which has heretofore been allowed; so that the court may, in its discretion, give to these special commissioners the full compensation heretofore allowed under the old fee-bill, and the presumption is that the court will give the full compensation heretofore allowed. It seems to me that this cuts off the benefit anticipated from cutting down the fees one-half.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I am perfectly willing to put in there "shall not in any case exceed the amount heretofore allowed for like service or contemplated by this act," so as to restrict it to the fees contemplated by this act.

Mr. MORTON. Further, Mr. President, it seems to me that the adoption of this amendment will destroy the harmony of the system. There should be a complete record of the proceedings in every bankrupt's case, a complete record that will show all that has been done by the court or by any of the officers; and that record must be kept by some one person, or it will not be complete. There may be under this amendment half a dozen different special commissioners appointed in the same case to supervise and take charge of different parts of the same business. Each one makes up his own record, and you have half a dozen different records in the same case. You have no complete, harmonious record of the case. That, it seems to me, is a very serious objection indeed.

But, Mr. President, this amendment contemplates that the judge himself shall act as the register or the clerk in some cases. Judges are very much averse to performing clerical labor. We all know that. A man who has been on the bench any length of time becomes exceedingly averse to performing the duties of clerk, and my observation is, as a general thing, that they would make very poor clerks. The judges will not act as clerks; they will appoint special commissioners; they will appoint some one to perform that duty in every case; and those who are acquainted with the practice of the law know that where a special officer is appointed to do a particular thing his compensation always amounts to as much as that of the regular officer, and generally amounts to more, because it is a special thing; and if these duties are to be assigned to special commissioners appointed for the particular purpose, I agree with the Senator from New Jersey that it is likely to cost more than it does under the present system.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Ohio is a little mistaken in what he states about the method of the appointment of these registers as they were originally appointed. All these registers were appointed by the district courts of the United States on the spot. We had not the power to confer on the Chief Justice the right to appoint a register.

Mr. MORTON. They were appointed on the nomination of the Chief Justice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chief Justice was called upon to nominate, and the judge of the district court had a right to accept or reject that nomination as he thought the interests of justice and fair play required. I do not deny that there is here and there a register who ought to be put out of office, and there is here and there a Senator who ought to be put out of office, and who is put out by the judgment of the very body in which he sits, but that is no proof that it is a good thing to abolish all Senators by any means. Judges are sometimes impeached and removed for misconduct, but that is no reason for making an onslaught upon all judges. These gentlemen—not so many as my friend supposes—were in the first place selected by the late Chief Justice of the United States, a man certainly eminent. They were selected by him upon information from each district where they were to be appointed, not the information of petitions alone of the various members of the bar, &c., but he required as essential to his nomination, according to my recollection, the certificate of some one or more of the delegation from that State on their written responsibility as to the character and fitness of the person proposed. I know that was the test applied in my own State, and I know that we have had registers who, as a whole, have been above reproach. I have never heard anything against any of them, with one single exception in one single case.

And then, as my friend from Indiana suggests, in the next place, the names of these men having thus been selected by the Chief Justice on the petitions of the people and on the written and responsible recommendations of some Senator or Member of Congress in the particular district, were sent to the district judge. He knew the men in his locality; he had just as good power to judge of the fitness of a register as he has of this special commissioner, precisely. He did judge. If after all that sifting the register was satisfactory to him, he was appointed; if not, he was rejected. Then suppose he is appointed; what is the next step in the power of the courts over this register? He becomes an officer of the court, a sworn standing officer of the court, whose business it is to attend to this special class of cases; and, as my friend very well remarks, in continuity to attend to a case as a whole, not he attending to a half of it and another lawyer to another half; but he keeps a complete record of every step in the course of his duties, which covers all that he has to do, or all that this special man would have to do with the estate; he makes his report; he is amenable to the court as its officer; he can be punished for contempt or fined if he does any misdeed in any respect; he can be removed at the pleasure of the district judge; I mean by that, when cause is shown which is satisfactory to the district judge. Of course the district judge would not have any pleasure in removing a faithful officer. So I say that in effect, whenever the district judge is satisfied that a register is not doing his duty faithfully, that he is charging exorbitant fees, or that he is suspected of corruption, all the district judge has to do, by his single fiat, is to turn him out of office. I say, therefore, that the judge has as great power over the operations of the register as he can have over any special commissioner or person appointed by him.

Then I mentioned on Friday last a consideration that I think ought not to be lost sight of, if this law is to continue. These registers have become skillful in the business, the honest and intelligent ones of them, which, I believe, embraces more than nine-tenths. They have become skillful in understanding this law. It does not require that every creditor should go to a lawyer to present his case to the register for proof, or that every assignee should go to a lawyer and pay a large fee to get his opinion as to the propriety of disposing of property in a particular way. The register has become skilled in all this, and he is bound to give his advice. He is bound to have the hearings of these questions at a fee-bill rate which would not be one-tenth of what a special lawyer would charge who was called upon to give the same advice or the same directions.

If there is value in experience, if there is value in the honest pursuit of this duty which registers have been carrying on ever since 1867, a period of nearly seven years, then there is value in keeping them as a body; and with this particular power that now exists of disposing of the bad ones, if there be any, and the provision that we have made in the bill for readjusting what they are to charge for the duties they perform, and of consolidating as far as possible into their hands or into the hands of the clerk or the assignee, as the case may be, any duties which now appear to be performed in duplicate, I am sure the Senator from Ohio ought to ask nothing more. Certainly it was the opinion of the committee, after a most careful consideration of it, that it would be very injurious to dispense with these men.

Mr. THURMAN. I must confess that I am a little surprised at some of the objections made to this amendment. The Senator from Indiana—and in that he is sustained by the Senator from Vermont—thinks that it would destroy the perfection, or continuity I believe they called it, of the record in a case. That is a little surprising to me, for I thought the proceedings of a master-commissioner were as much part of the record in any case in which he was appointed as the proceedings of a register in bankruptcy can be part of the record.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is perfectly correct in stating that, but he does not state the point. The point was that if there is any value in having a special man, ordinarily there would be more than one special man for a case. If you are only to have one special commissioner for a case, like one register for a case, then you have merely a change of names, except that you change the register at the whim of the judge. The point was that there might be several, and naturally would be, in order to limit what is said to be the expense of traveling so far; one commissioner in one county, if you please, to hear the claimant's proofs, &c., another in another, and so on. If that be so, the Senator can plainly enough see that you would have a very extraordinary set of records when consolidated at last into one.

Mr. THURMAN. My friend sees that he might have just exactly the same objection to the present system, if a case should arise in which it would be necessary to have different master-commissioners at the same time in a case, that is, a case in which it would be necessary to have different registers at the same time, because of the difference in the locality in which they are to act; and he would have just as much trouble with his record in one case as in the other. But that is an extreme case which shows nothing. It would not happen, I imagine, one time in a hundred, nor one time in five hundred, that there would be any necessity whatever for more than one master-commissioner, just as now it does not happen one time in five hundred that it is necessary for any but one register to act.

The other objection, which strikes me with surprise, is that both the Senators, in fact all the Senators that have spoken in opposition to this amendment, seem to consider it as excluding from the performance of any duty under the bankrupt act, from any employment under it, all the present registers; and we are told how much experience they have, and how valuable that experience is to them in the exercise of their functions. That is very true. It is true many of them have gained experience—those who have had any business. I think most of them have had none at all; but those who have had any business have gained experience, and that experience is valuable. But where is the difficulty? What is there to prevent the district court, if this amendment should become a law, from appointing any one of them special master-commissioner, if the court is satisfied that he is a perfectly upright and proper man to be appointed, and thus availing itself of the experience of this man?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the advantage, then, of this proposition?

Mr. THURMAN. The advantage of it is that when you have removed these people out of the way, a case does not go, as a matter of course, before a register in bankruptcy; but only goes there when the court, seeing that it cannot discharge the duties itself, sees fit to send it to a commissioner. As the practice now is, every case goes, as a matter of course, before a register. It is to do away with that matter-of-course proceeding, and to require only those cases to go before a subordinate that the court shall think ought to go before such subordinate, that this amendment is offered. In cases of that kind the court can send them before a special master if unable to attend to the business itself; but as the matter now stands, every case ex necessitate goes before a register in bankruptcy. There is an additional cost, and there is this expense of which there is so much complaint. But, sir, if this amendment should prevail, and there is any register known to a court to be a proper man, to be an experienced man, an upright man, he is the very man in all probability that the court will appoint special master-commissioner in that case. I assume that that will certainly be so.

However, I have said more than I expected to say upon it. I have submitted the amendment upon the recommendations to which I have already referred, and the Senate can decide upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. I have listened to what the Senator from Ohio has said, and I must say (I hope he will pardon me) that I cannot feel its force. Indeed, if he had not given in this Chamber ample assurance that he was friendly to a bankrupt law, I should suspect him of intending, by this amendment, to deal it a fatal blow. I believe, if adopted, it would be so thoroughly injurious that it might properly be entitled "An amendment to impair the efficiency of the bankrupt law, and to augment the expense of its administration." It would impair the efficiency of the law, because it would remove from all the activities under it those agents and officers who now have seven years of experience by which they have become disciplined to the work. Why throw them aside?

Something is said with regard to the conduct of individuals; but they may be displaced without overturning the system. By the intervention of the district court a new register may be secured. Why, then, the more radical measure now moved by the Senator? The remedy he seeks may be obtained legitimately through the court as now constituted. Why, then, abandon the experience accumulated during this considerable period of time?

There is an economy in administration, as there is in wealth; and we should show very little sense of that economy if we now set aside the opportunities which have matured to our hands. Experience in life is much; it is what we all covet; nor is it of little importance on this occasion. It is through the administration of this great law that it becomes manifest to the country, and that the citizen and the man of business everywhere learns to understand its character. Let it then be administered by those whose experience enables them to apply it justly and faithfully. Do not intrust it to novices.

But the Senator says that these considerable duties may be performed by the district judges. Are not the district judges already severely tasked? Have not some of them now more than they can do? I speak for one, knowing something of the court in Boston; and I feel that I should err much if I consented to place upon the judge, who administers that court with so much ability, any additional burden. I would rather relieve him than add anything new. But should he act under this amendment, obviously, he would do so, as the Senator himself suggests, by a master or a commissioner, which would be a source of increased expense; for every such incidental or occasional officer would be employed at larger expense than the regular officer known as the register.

It seems to me, therefore, our conclusion is easy. Let us keep the administration that we now enjoy, knowing that it is expert, besides being under the watchful supervision of an intelligent court. These registers are like regulars, who know their business. The Senator, as I understand, would substitute a militia, who often render most essential service, but we know full well not always able to make good the place of regulars. I am now for the regulars. I am for keeping the existing registers without any change except that which may be made by the judges in individual cases.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, because it seems to go in the direction of the saving of expense under the bankrupt law. There have been in this country very grave objections to the existing bankrupt law. When the original bill came from the House before the holidays, I had made up my mind to vote for that bill to repeal the whole law, because I knew there were very just objections to the existing bankrupt law.

One of those objections was to that provision which gave to any creditor the right, after the expiration of fourteen days from the failure to pay his commercial paper, to force a debtor into bankruptcy. Of that provision of the old bankrupt law the country was complaining everywhere, especially since the panic, when creditors became exacting and every man was taking his neighbor by the throat and saying, "Pay me that thou owest." Then the people saw the odious provisions of the bankrupt law which enable one man to force another into bankruptcy simply because he has made default in payment of his paper for a very limited time—fourteen days.

Another grievous complaint that has existed against this law from its inception is the great expense to which parties are put who go into bankruptcy. It is known that in a large number of cases both of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy the creditor gets nothing; these "regulars," in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, get the whole. The registers, marshals, and clerks absorb the whole estate where the estate is small, and curtail very materially the estate, even if it is large; so that in a great many cases the creditor gets nothing and the bankrupt's estate is exhausted by the "regulars," as the Senator from Massachusetts styles them, and the creditors are the losers.

This amendment of the Senator from Ohio looks in the direction of economy in the expenses of bankruptcy proceedings in court. The argument on the other side would seem to proceed on the idea that the masters that may be appointed will perform all the duties now performed by the registers. That is not the obvious intention of the amendment. The meaning of the amendment is that where the court finds itself unable to perform these duties, then it may appoint a master-commissioner; but many of the duties that are now performed by the register in bankruptcy would be performed by the judge of the district court under this amendment. Why, sir, what are the duties now performed by a register in bankruptcy? A review of those duties will make it obvious that the judge of the district court could, without any inconvenience to himself, perform a number of the duties now required to be performed by the registers. I read from section 4 of the act of 1867:

That every register in bankruptcy, so appointed and qualified, shall have power, and it shall be his duty, to make adjudication of bankruptcy.

That duty could be performed by the district judge without the intervention of a register in bankruptcy. For that the register receives a fee, which would be saved to the estate of the bankrupt under this amendment.

To receive the surrender of any bankrupt.

Could not that be done by the district judge as well as by a register in bankruptcy? And yet a register in bankruptcy is now paid a fee for the performance of that service, simply receiving the surrender of any bankrupt.

To administer oaths in all proceedings before him; to hold and preside at meetings of creditors.

The district judge could do that just as well as a register in bankruptcy. But without stopping to comment upon it, I will read on:

To take proof of debts; to make all computations of dividends, and all orders of distribution, and to furnish the assignee with a certified copy of such orders, and of the schedules of creditors and assets filed in each case; to audit and pass accounts of assignees; to grant protection; to pass the last examination of any bankrupt in cases whenever the assignee or any creditor do not oppose, and to sit in chambers and dispatch there such part of the administrative business of the court, and such uncontested matters as shall be defined in general rules and orders, or as the district judge shall in any particular matter direct; and he shall also make short memoranda of his proceedings in each case in which he shall act, in a docket to be kept by him for that purpose, and he shall forthwith, as the proceedings are taken, forward to the clerk of the district court a certified copy of said memoranda, which shall be entered by said clerk in the proper minute-book to be kept in his office, and any register of the court may act for any other register thereof.

More than one-half of the duties that are here specified to be performed by the registers of bankruptcy, the district judge would perform under this amendment without the intervention of a register or commissioner or master; and in that aspect of it there would be a great saving of expense. If this cumbrous, expensive machinery is to be kept in the bill, for one I am utterly indifferent as to its passage. While I believe the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary so modify the provisions of the existing law as to take away many of its harsh features, and, therefore, if other provisions are added to them, would be such an improvement as would justify a continuance of the bankrupt law, yet, notwithstanding those amendments, if others are not added, if the cumbrous and expensive machinery, which is to exhaust the estate of the bankrupt, is to be continued, we had better abolish the whole system of bankruptcy; and for one I shall be perfectly indifferent about the passage of this bill unless something is done to curtail the expenses which are now incurred by placing a man in bankruptcy. In what way are his creditors benefited by throwing him into bankruptcy? He must have a large estate or they will never get a cent. Why, sir, I have never been a creditor of a very large bankrupt, but I have had several notices of claims against bankrupts; and knowing the expenses which were incident to the whole system, I have never yet proved a claim against a bankrupt, but was content to lose my claim rather than go to any expense or trouble in connection with it; and such, I believe, is the experience of one-half of creditors of men who have gone into bankruptcy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I suggest to my friend from Delaware, with his permission, that the committee and the Senate have now determined that these expenses shall be diminished for the time being one-half; and have required the judges of the Supreme Court, which is not a political body, as my friend knows, to readjust this whole question, not only of fees but of the performance of duties, so as to avoid any duplication—to consolidate everything. That, I am sure my friend will admit, is in the interest of economy and reform.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly it is; I do not deny that. I have no doubt that under the amendments reported by the Judiciary Committee the expenses will be considerably lessened; but I still believe that they will be larger under those amendments than is necessary; for I believe that in many districts, probably in a majority of the districts, a large proportion of the duties now required to be performed by the register should be performed by the judge without the intervention of a register, or master, or anybody else.

Why, sir, take a judicial district in the rural sections of this country. There may be in Boston, there may be in New York, there may be in Philadelphia, and in the other large cities, a pressure of business upon the district courts; but in nine-tenths of the districts of this country the district judge has ample time to attend to every case of bankruptcy that comes before him, and to perform the duties which are now performed by the registers in bankruptcy. I do not think it would be heaping burdens upon the district judges. I do not desire to see the judicial position overburdened in the performance of duties; but I believe that the judges themselves would be perfectly willing, in the interest of economy and for the benefit of the parties concerned, to perform these duties in nine-tenths of the districts in this country. In such districts as are crowded with business, in the large cities, the provision which authorizes them to appoint a master or commissioner intervenes and comes to their assistance; but in the rural sections of the country, where there are no large cities, where there is not such a pressure of business, I repeat that the duties now performed by the registers could be performed exclusively by the district judges. I shall vote, therefore, for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PRATT. Before the vote is taken on this amendment, I wish to submit a few remarks in opposition to it.

This amendment might do very well in small States, such States as Delaware and Rhode Island, where the creditors and parties interested could reach the seat of government where the district court sits in a few hours' travel; but it would not suit States situated like my own, where there is but one district court, and where it would require parties and witnesses to travel to the seat of government one hundred and fifty miles. Under the existing law there are thirteen congressional districts in Indiana, and of course so many registers. These registers are clothed with judicial powers as well as with administrative powers. They discharge a large portion of the business in the settlement of the bankrupt's estate. They are convenient local forums, to which the bankrupt and the creditors can resort without long distances of travel.

The Senator from Delaware who has just addressed the Senate has enumerated the powers of registers in bankruptcy under the existing law. Let me call attention again to some of those powers as they are laid down in the fourth section of the act of 1867. In the first place, a register has the power, and it is made his duty, "to make adjudication of bankruptcy." It is likewise made his duty to receive the surrender of the bankrupt's estate. He is authorized "to administer oaths in all proceedings before him." He is likewise clothed with power "to hold and preside at meetings of creditors." In most of the cases in the western country it is to be presumed that the creditors of a bankrupt would live in his immediate vicinity. Meetings of creditors are necessary for divers purposes; in the first place, for the selection of an assignee; then for the purpose of making a composition with the debtor. Now, if they are compelled to travel to the seat of government a distance of one hundred and fifty miles for the purpose of attending those meetings, it is imposing a very great hardship upon a great many men; because there would be cases in which the creditors are very numerous, and in order to attend these meetings, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, they must go to the seat of government, to the seat of Federal jurisdiction.

Furthermore, the registers are clothed with power "to take proof of debts"—of all claims against the bankrupt. These creditors are to resort to the register's court, under the existing law, for the purpose of proving their debts; but if the amendment of my friend from Ohio is adopted, instead of resorting to the register a few miles distant from the domicile of the bankrupt, all these creditors must resort to the seat of government for the purpose of establishing their debts.

Then the register is authorized "to make all computations of dividends and all orders of distribution," all distribution of assets of the bankrupt, "and to furnish the assignee with a certified copy of such orders." He is authorized also "to audit and pass accounts of assignees" and "to pass the last examination of any bankrupt in cases whenever the assignee or a creditor does not oppose;" and furthermore—here is a general power—he is authorized "to sit in chambers and dispatch there such part of the administrative business of the court, and such uncontested matters as shall be defined in general rules and orders, or as the district judge shall in any particular matter direct."

Now, Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Ohio proposes to transfer all these powers to the district judge and require him to perform what now thirteen registers in bankruptcy in the State of Indiana perform. I submit that it will load him down, that it will be impossible for him to wade through such an accumulation of duties. Then, looking to the convenience of the bankrupt himself, looking to the convenience of the creditors, and looking to the immense saving of expense, it seems to me that this amendment ought not to prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected—ayes 10, noes not counted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I wish my friend from Ohio would offer the amendment which he has shown to the committee, and which will overturn a considerable part of the argument that he has been making, and which we are satisfied with.

Mr. THURMAN. I now offer the following amendment as an additional section:

SEC. —. That in addition to the officers now authorized to take proof of debts against the estate of a bankrupt, notaries public are hereby authorized to take such proof in the manner and under the regulations provided by law, such proof to be certified by the notary and attested by his signature and official seal.

One word of explanation. As the law now stands, proof of debt can only be made in the district in which the suit is pending before a register in bankruptcy. The consequence is that a person may have to travel a great distance in order to find a register. There is one congressional district in Ohio, for instance, that contains about ten counties, and a person might have to travel seventy or eighty miles in that district in order to make proof of his claim. There is another district nearly one hundred miles long, and the same inconvenience might result there. In the case of non-resident creditors, the statute is that the proof may be made before a register in bankruptcy or any United States commissioner, a commissioner appointed by the circuit court of the United States. That is also inconvenient, because you must find either a register or a commissioner. I know of no reason why proof may not be made before a notary public under the regulations and subject to the restrictions that are provided in the act; and I therefore offer the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have examined the amendment, and I think some other gentlemen of the committee have, and I believe we have no objection to it. I think myself it will improve the law in saving the necessity of creditors traveling a great distance sometimes to make merely this preliminary prima facie proof of their claims to be sent to the register. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer the following amendment: that section 2 of the said act be amended by adding next after the words "adverse interest," in line 12, the words "or owing any debt to such bankrupt."

I offer this amendment for the reason that a very serious question has arisen in the operation of this law as to whether circuit courts have jurisdiction to collect debts due to the bankrupt when suit shall be brought by the assignee. Many of the judges have held that the circuit courts have not jurisdiction, while other judges, under the old laws as well as the present one, including the late Chief Justice, have held that the circuit courts have jurisdiction. My purpose in offering this amendment is to set that question at rest. I remember a case in my own practice where my associates and myself brought some four hundred suits in the name of the assignee in bankruptcy, and a motion was made to dismiss the suits for want of jurisdiction. His honor the Chief Justice was sitting with the district judge in my State, and at first they were inclined to put us out of court in every case, but after a long and elaborate discussion the court sustained the jurisdiction. But while the court in that case sustained the jurisdiction, and while it was sustained by Judge Story and Judge McLean, other highly respectable judges have decided that the circuit courts have not such jurisdiction, and I believe the current of authority is that way. The matter ought to be set at rest one way or the other. I think the circuit courts ought to have jurisdiction, because it is a very great convenience for them to have it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend had noticed the amendment adopted on Friday last from the committee he would have seen that we had considered that matter somewhat.

Mr. MERRIMON. I was not aware of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And we have in line 10 of section 2 stricken out the words "the same," and inserted "any." That clause is as follows:

The powers and jurisdiction hereby granted may be exercised either by said court, or by any justice thereof, in term-time or vacation. Said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits, at law or in equity, which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to, or vested in, such assignee.

Now, in our motion, intending to meet our friend's result, we struck out the words "the same" and inserted "any," so that it now reads that the "circuit courts of the United States shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of any district of all suits at law or in equity," &c.

Mr. MERRIMON. In those cases where the courts have held that concurrent jurisdiction does not exist, it has been upon the ground that the words do not embrace debts that are to be collected by the assignee. It does not turn on whether it is in the same district, but it turns on whether this class of debts is embraced.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this point is covered by an amendment which the committee has offered, and I do not think much doubt can arise upon it; but the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is in the same direction, and I shall have no objection to it, because it covers really the same point proposed by the committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is doubt about it; and it might give rise to considerable litigation if we did not make the point clear.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to the words being added, for one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have another amendment to offer, and I beg to have the attention of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. After the words "collection of all the assets of the bankrupt," in the fourteenth line of the first section of the bankrupt act, I move to insert "where the legal, as contradistinguished from equitable, debt or demand exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum of $500;" so that the law will read in this way:

And the jurisdiction hereby conferred shall extend to all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt where the legal, as contradistingnished from equitable, debt or demand exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum of $500.

I offer the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, after the words "to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt," in the fourteenth line of the first section of the bankrupt act, to insert the words "where the legal, as contradistinguished from equitable, debt or demand exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum of $500."

Mr. MERRIMON. I will state why I offer that amendment. When an assignee proceeds to collect the debts that are due the estate of the bankrupt, as the law now stands, he may and generally does bring all his suits in the Federal courts; and in many of the States—I know it is so in my own State—he brings a party for a trifling debt of sixty or seventy or one hundred dollars, two or three hundred miles to court. The result is that the costs in collecting a debt of fifty or one hundred or two hundred dollars are sometimes equal to the debt itself. The costs are made up, not only of the court costs, but of the mileage costs for the marshal. These small debts, inasmuch as they are not matters of such grave moment, might be collected very conveniently through the State courts. Very often they are sold under the order of the court in order to avoid delay and expense in collection. If the assignee were left to pursue his remedy in the State courts to collect debts of this character, it would save a vast deal of loss of time and expense to persons who might be sued in that behalf, and would also save the district and circuit courts of the United States a great deal of trouble. As the law now stands, the district and circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of a debt of five dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator does not mean to say that they have exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; they have not; but my objection is this—and I have had considerable observation in the practice under this law—that the assignees always bring their suits in the Federal courts for the reason that, in the first place, the costs are larger; they are always nearly in the interests of the officers of those courts, and they are in the interest of their counsel; and the taxed fees allowed counsel are generally more than they are in the State courts. The taxed fee in the Federal circuit courts is usually twenty dollars. The taxed fee in the State courts is very often four or five dollars, and seldom exceeding ten dollars. This would cut down a vast amount of costs and rid the Federal courts of a vast deal of litigation that they ought not to be troubled with.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be different in different States. In the State of Vermont, in matters over $100, the expenses of collecting a debt are greater in the State courts than they are in the Federal courts.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is not my observation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have not observed it in my State, I suppose. The difference is according to the different fee-bills and modes of practice in the different States. The law now stands, and I think it is right as it is, giving the assignee in the first instance the discretion whether the interest of the estate requires him to appeal to Federal judicial interference to collect the debts, or whether he is safe in appealing to the local court of the particular county where the debtor may reside. I think that discretion is a wise one. If it were left absolutely with the assignee, there might be force in an amendment which should provide that the assignee in that respect should be subject to the direction of the court as to where he should institute his proceedings, where any special difference would be made in order to collect the debt, so as to save as much to the estate as possible. But as the law now stands, the assignee, as I understand it, is subject, under the rules and orders of the Supreme Court in respect to his conduct in the collection of debts, to the direction of the court whose officer he is; and it is therefore now within the competence of the district judge, or the circuit judge, on appeal from him, to direct that the assignee shall collect a certain class of assets—small ones—in the State or county courts, or justices' courts of the particular State or county where he may happen to be, and in respect to some assets to collect them in the Federal courts, dependent on what the state of feeling might be. There might be cases where a set of debtors, the friends of the assignee, if you please, living in the neighborhood, and where, under State proceedings, the jury would have to be drawn from the immediate neighborhood, because by almost all the State laws the jury must be drawn from the very county, would be able to prevent the collection of a certain class of small debts. The jury would disagree, or there would be some hole out of which these debtors could escape; and in such cases it ought to be within the scope of the Federal court to protect the interest of the estate and of the creditors by having these people understand that they would be brought before a jury that was not exactly of their own immediate neighborhood, but who were impartial citizens, of the same State to be sure, but out of reach of the local influence that might prevail.

So the true law, as I think, is the one which, as I understand, now exists, and that it is a matter of discretion with the bankrupt court to determine how this shall be; and if I am under any mistake about that now, as I think I am not, the new provision that we have inserted for a readjudication by the judges of the Supreme Court of the rules which we authorize them to make governing the conduct of assignees by name, and regulating their duties by name, would make it perfectly clear that that power would exist.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope that this amendment of my friend from North Carolina will not be adopted, for the reason that it makes an absolute rule which prohibits the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in any case unless the debt is $500. As the law now stands, it is within the jurisdiction of the court to direct the assignee whether in a given case the suit shall be brought in the State or in the Federal courts; and wherever it appeared to the judge, or to a committee of creditors who should appear before the judge and make a suggestion of that kind, that the interests of the estate would be best subserved by having a suit or suits brought in the State courts, then he would so order. But if we adopt this amendment, we positively exclude from the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, under the laws of Congress enforcing its own laws, the right to try any case under $500 at all. I submit to my friend that that is carrying it too far.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to say one word in reply to the Senator from Vermont. The very excellent judge in the district where I live made a rule, which I think was not authorized by the law, and which I believe he thought himself was not authorized by the law, that no suit should be brought by an assignee in the district court for a less sum than sixty dollars. But I apprehend that if an assignee had brought a suit in the district court for five dollars, the judge would have no right to put him out of court, because, by the law, he had a right to bring his suit there for that sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question right there, if I do not interrupt him?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the judge should find that an assignee had violated one of his rules, is it not in the power of the judge at any time when he thinks an assignee misconducts himself to remove him and appoint another? In that case if an assignee should have disobeyed the suggestion of the judge, I ask whether the judge could not have put him out, and put in a man who would obey his orders?

Mr. MERRIMON. My answer is that in that case the judge would exercise an arbitrary and unlawful power if he did it upon that ground, which I trust no United States judge ever will do, for the reason that the law says the court shall have jurisdiction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be; but the law equally says to the judge that he may remove the assignee for cause at any time; and this law that we now propose, if my friend will give attention to the last two or three sections of it, specially provides that the Supreme Court shall make rules which shall guide the conduct and the duties to be performed by these assignees, so that certainly under that, if not under the present law, provision could be made.

Mr. MERRIMON. He cannot remove the assignee for any cause. He has the physical power to do so, but he has not the lawful power to do it. He has the discretion, but it must be a sound legal discretion and not an arbitrary one; and I say that if a judge should undertake to remove an assignee simply on the ground that he had done what the law authorized, he ought to be impeached for it. It would be an arbitrary exercise of authority, that the law and his oath of office forbid. The assignee, as the law now stands, has a right to bring a suit for five dollars in the Federal court, and the judge without the exercise of an arbitrary power has no right to put him out of court. But, as I said, the very excellent judge in my own district made a rule that assignees must bring their suits to recover small debts under sixty dollars before the State magistrates in his district. In my State I have known persons sued and brought four hundred miles to answer for the collection of a debt of $100, and the mileage of the marshal and the court costs were in some cases actually greater than the debt itself. It seems to me that simply to state this fact, and to suggest that hundreds and thousands of cases in almost every State in the Union may arise very much like this, is to suggest the reason why this amendment ought to be made.

The Senator from Vermont objects to it, that perhaps the State courts or the people of a particular locality in a State may be unfriendly to the assignee and the collection of debts. It seems to me that that objection has very little weight in it. The juries that attend the Federal courts are the very people who compose the people of the State, and the judges of the several States, beginning with the judge of the lowest order and going up to the highest, are as much bound by this bankrupt law and every law of the United States, including the Constitution, as are the Federal judges. They take an oath, and their obligation is to execute these laws in the very same manner; so that the objection which he raises is unfounded.

This appears in a stronger light when we consider the general jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States for the purpose of collecting debts. Suppose a citizen of New York has a debt against a citizen of North Carolina. It is for $400—say it is for $499. That citizen of New York cannot go into the courts of the United States to collect such debt. He is bound in that case to seek his remedy through the State courts. If it is right and proper and necessary that the assignee in bankruptcy should go exclusively into Federal courts to collect his debts, surely it is no more than right that a citizen who has a debt of $499 should be allowed to go into the Federal courts; but in that case, under the general jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, unless the debt amounts to $500 exclusive of costs, the citizen in a distant State cannot bring his suit in the Federal courts.

If the amendment I have offered prevails, it seems to me it will cut off a vast deal of what amounts, by reason of the large extent of territory embraced by these districts and long distances to and from courts, to absolute oppression; and I speak with the more confidence because I have seen it, not in a few cases but in hundreds. I have known hundreds of cases brought in the Federal courts to recover debts of less than $500, where the costs that accumulated in collecting these plain matters of debt were equal in many instances to the whole debt, and very often to 50 or 75 per cent. of it. I cannot see any evil that will result from it. The State courts, from the highest to the lowest, as I have said, are as much bound by the laws of the United States as the courts of the United States; and if we are to lose confidence in the State courts, if we are to lose confidence in the juries sitting in the State courts, for the same reason we must lose confidence in the juries sitting in the Federal courts; and if the party litigant shall lose in the one court, he will as certainly lose in the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One word, Mr. President. I promise not to prolong this matter. The Senator from North Carolina, I think, is a little unjust in his comparison between this law and that limiting the right of citizens of the various States to sue in the circuit courts. That, to be sure, is a mere regulation of Congress, as this is; but that is the private right of one single citizen that may arise to him in one place or another, and he must submit to the inconvenience of State prejudice to that extent. But here we have a case where all the debtors in a particular locality are to be called upon at once by the assignee to pay their debts into this bankrupt's estate, and to pay them in for the benefit of creditors. Now, the time has been—and I am sure my friend will not consider that I am opening unpleasant topics, because I do not intend to do that—in some of the States of this Union where if an assignee in bankruptcy should sue a great number of persons at the same time, (and I am not sure but it is just as much so in one section of the country as another, and I beg my friend not to suppose that I am opening anything political, if he were to bring suits of that kind against all the debtors at once who would not pay, there would be such a local feeling created in the immediate vicinity of those debtors, which they would create themselves, that you could not get a verdict in one case in twenty, although the cases would be absolutely unanswerable in point of law.

Of course that depends upon feeling; and to show my friend that I am not alluding to states of feeling that have existed in the South at some time or other, as I understand, I will mention that I have known that case to exist once in my own State, where a New York insurance company had insured the property of hundreds of farmers in the State of Vermont upon premiums that were to be paid yearly—not all paid in advance—and then the insurance company failed, and it was necessary to collect the assets of that insurance company in order to pay its creditors, and these people were clearly liable upon their notes. There was no mistake about it. They said that there was misrepresentation, and all that kind of talk which we are accustomed to in such cases; as when a man gives a little too much for a horse, he always says there was a warrantee or something. But any fair-minded man would say, and every fair-minded man did say, so far as the law went, that there was no defense to these insurance notes at all. What was the result? The result was that these notes were so small, that the assignee or receiver of the foreign insurance company was obliged to sue in the county courts of the State, sometimes in the justices' courts, depending on the sum, whether it was below $100 or above. Although there were not very great numbers of them in one county, though it covered the whole side of our little State, it was found impossible to get a verdict upon these insurance notes in one case in ten, for the jury would be so affected by this prejudice that had run through the minds of the farmers that they had incurred a liability, and that they were not likely to be safe upon it after all in having their premiums repaid to them in case of loss in the form of the sum promised by the policies, that it was impossible to get a verdict from a jury even in as well-regulated and old a community as ours, where we think (perhaps we are wrong) that people stand up for justice as much as anywhere.

How would it be in any case of excitement where there were large claims in favor of the bankrupt in any particular locality in a State—for I am not referring to any particular State by any means; and it would be as likely to happen in my own as any other—where some great insurance company fails? Unless there is the power in the assignee or in the court to let the people know that they are to be brought before a Federal tribunal, where the jury is summoned from all parts of the community—and not from one locality, so that generally you would get ten out of twelve of the jury from people who were scattered about, and who did not feel this special influence—there would be influences brought to bear in the neighborhood that would prejudice jurors, in spite of their intention to do right, in such a way as that they would always find their way clear to disagree and not give a verdict.

I know that my friend from North Carolina is in favor of the general principles of the amendments we have made to the bankrupt bill, if I correctly understand him, and I know therefore that this amendment is offered in aid of what he thinks the right action of the bill, and not to destroy it; but I do submit to him that, under the provisions we have made for regulating this subject of what the assignee may do, it would be better to wait until that is done before we take another step.

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe, Mr. President, that the constituency, as a whole, which I represent, are indifferent as to whether we have a bankrupt law or not; but, in my judgment, the country ought to have one, and, therefore, I desire to see the present bankrupt law so amended and modified that it will be acceptable to the American people. The great difficulty about making it acceptable is this: that several localities of our country are highly commercial, and there such a law is almost absolutely necessary; but the greater portion of our country is an agricultural, a producing, country, and they are the people who care very little about it. I believe, however, without reference to the particular wants of any locality, that the country needs and ought to have a permanent bankrupt law. I said to my friend [Mr. EDMUNDS] privately the other day, "It is very important that we should put the bankrupt law into such shape as that it will be acceptable to the whole people, else we shall stand a very good chance of having it repealed by and by, if not now, which, I think, would result in great detriment to the commercial interests of the country." It is, therefore, that I am anxious, by amendments like these, to put it in such a shape as that it will operate as lightly on the agricultural portions of the country as possible. If that is not done you may be sure that many localities in the South and West will come here at a future Congress and demand the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Now, sir, a word as to the objections which my friend from Vermont raises to the proposed amendment. He says the juries will be prejudiced, and that very often when an assignee brings his suit in a State court, and appeals to a jury, the jury, without reference to the right, will find against the claim. It seems to me that the same people sitting as jurors in a Federal court will find in the same way there if such a prejudice prevails as he supposes. But I have not found in the course of my experience that juries are generally so corrupt in any locality as to plainly violate their oaths. You may find a jury now and then that will do it in a particular case; but I have never been anywhere yet, where, in case after case, and repeatedly, and on purpose, juries would violate the plain obligations that rested upon them under an oath, as well as also the solemn instructions of a learned judge. I do not think that he will find any locality in the South, and I trust, ordinarily, he would not find any in Vermont or elsewhere, where a jury under instructions from a judge, would deliberately and plainly violate their oath; and especially am I sustained in this view when I remember that every judge of the State courts, every juror in the State courts, every juror sitting in a State court as much as if he were sitting in a Federal court, is bound by the Constitution and laws of the Union. They are bound by their oaths to support and execute these laws; and the same obligation that rests upon them in the Federal courts rests upon them in the State courts.

Then there is another great protection which my friend has not seen fit to advert to. A judge is presiding in a court; an assignee has brought a suit in that court; the issues are presented to the jury; the judge charges them as to the law and their duties, and they in the face of the facts, in the face of the charge of the judge, find against the assignee. The remedy is very plain in any court, State or Federal. A just, intelligent judge would at once say to the jury, "This verdict shall not stand; I not only set aside the verdict, but I reprimand the jury for violating their oaths;" and the next jury that comes will be very reluctant to find a similar verdict in a plain case.

I say, therefore, that the objection that my excellent friend has urged—and that is the only one I believe he has urged—does not arise. I do maintain that the debts less than $500 can be collected as easily, as readily, in the State courts as in the Federal courts; and they can be collected there for, I venture to say, one-third of the cost; and, what is more, they can be collected in a way that will put the people who live at distant points from where the Federal court sits to not a tithe of the trouble they are put to when they are sued, and are brought, under process served by the marshal, three or four hundred miles to attend a circuit or a district court of the United States.

I speak warmly and strongly about this matter, because I have seen the flagrant evils to which I refer. My constituents have felt it. One of the leading objections in my State against the bankrupt law has grown out of the fact that hundreds of people have been called three or four hundred miles to attend a court where they have been sued for a debt of $100; and the costs incurred, and which they eventually have to pay, breaking them up, amounted to more than the debt itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend has misunderstood me. I have adverted to another objection beside the one he has named of the prejudice of jurors. I wish to correct his misapprehension as to Vermont juries also while I am up. I did not say that a Vermont jury or any other jury would willfully violate their oaths. I say that Vermont juries, as well as juries in other States, are sometimes so prejudiced without knowing that it is prejudice, because a real prejudice is one that the party is not conscious of, and when it becomes to be a prejudice that the man is conscious of, it gets to be something else, and a little worse, I think.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask my friend whether in his experience he has not found that prejudices of this sort often control the action of jurors in Federal courts as well as State courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No doubt they do. Prejudice is an article that runs through human nature everywhere. But what I say is, that if you declare in a certain class of cases that the Federal courts shall not have any jurisdiction, no matter how strong the prejudice may be in a county where a great many of the debts of a particular trader or a particular corporation are to be collected, no matter how strong it may be, however innocent and honest it may be, if you say that the Federal court shall not in any case have jurisdiction there, then you lose your debt; but if you say to the Federal court, "You shall direct the assignee what to do in such cases, whether to sue in the State court, or to sue in the Federal court, according to the necessity of the case when it arises," you say what is right, and what I understand the law to be now, and the law to have been heretofore.

My friend does not quite agree with me in that, although the judge of his district does, as I understand him. He did make an order that a certain class of suits should be brought in the State courts. That order, of course, was subject to be modified or stayed whenever a state of public excitement or prejudice in any part of the State should arise to make it necessary. That is perfectly true. But when you are to provide, as I said before, that in no case shall suits up to $500 be brought in the Federal courts, you then put it in the power of a body of debtors of the estate, where there may be a case of extreme prejudice and a great class of cases of the same kind, like those of the insurance company I was mentioning in my own State where a prejudice runs through a whole community, to defeat the collection of the assets. It is not because the juror is dishonest; it is because some pretext or show of a defense, which is not a real and sound one in point of law, gets into the mind of the juror, and without intending to violate his oath at all he finds a verdict accordingly. So he would in a Federal court.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont why the assignee could not, in the case that he puts, ask a change of venue? If he supposes that public sentiment is hostile to the enforcement of the claim, is there anything in the existing laws of the States that would prevent a change of venue?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is nothing in the existing laws of the States, perhaps, that would prevent a change of venue, provided they allow a change of venue in civil cases, and the statutes provide for such a thing; but it is very rare indeed that in the case of a contract there can be a change of venue. I do not happen to remember the statute of any State which provides for that; and certainly the statutes of most of the New England States at least do not provide for a change of venue in any case, except possibly murder, and not in all the States about that. But my point is, not that it is not right that these suits should be brought in the State courts as a general thing, if you please, but that it is not right to say by law that the judge who regulates the estate shall have no discretion upon the subject to exercise when necessary. We leave the law by the bill as reported from the committee in such a way that the judge can exercise the discretion of requiring an assignee to sue in a State court in all cases, but the amendment of my friend from North Carolina declares that he shall have no such discretion, but that the assignees shall sue in the State courts under all circumstances and against all prejudices, if the claim does not exceed $500.

The choice, therefore, is between leaving this to the control of the court having the bankrupt in charge to require, as is done in my friend's district as I understand, as a general rule, that all suits not exceeding $100 shall be brought in the State courts. That is in the control of the judge. If he finds in a given case that that rule is not going to work, the same power that made the rule can undo it for that special case, and suspend it and direct him to sue somewhere else.

So, as I say, the point is between turning over all these cases up to $500 absolutely to the State courts, with no redress, or saying that the Federal courts shall have a jurisdiction to determine where the suit shall be brought.

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Vermont. As I understand it, the State courts would not be compelled to exercise this jurisdiction; that is to say, it would be at their option. Now suppose a State court, this provision being made, should refuse to exercise the jurisdiction, then there would be no power to enforce the collection of a debt at all.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to say just one word in reply to my friend from Iowa. It has been held by the courts, and I believe uniformly, that where there is no statute to the contrary, every State court has jurisdiction of any matter in litigation arising under a Federal law; and I believe it has not occurred in the history of our governments, either State or Federal, that any State has refused to allow its courts to take jurisdiction of any matter arising under a Federal statute or Federal law that it was competent for the court to have jurisdiction of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is it with the courts themselves?

Mr. MERRIMON. I have never known an instance in my State. I suppose that a judge would not undertake to do it unless the Legislature should pass a statute to that effect; but I have no idea that any State ever would venture to do that. It would be such a destruction of the comity between the Federal Government and the States as the people of no State, I trust, would tolerate or think of seriously.

Mr. WRIGHT. Nevertheless I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that it remains true that they would not be bound to exercise their jurisdiction, and if they refused to exercise it there would be no power to compel them.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then we could change the law.

Mr. WRIGHT. But we do not make a provision that will place us in a position where we shall have to change the law, and all these estates be hung up in the mean time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This amendment is not susceptible of being amended, or I would suggest to the Senator from North Carolina to add the words "unless the district court order to the contrary."

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that will answer the Senator's purpose I shall not object.

Mr. MERRIMON. That will answer my purpose, and I accept the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment as modified is, that section 1 of said act be amended by inserting after the words, "collection of the assets of the bankrupt," in the tenth line, the following words:

When the legal, as contradistinguished from equitable, debt or demand exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum of $500, unless the court having charge of the estate order to the contrary.

Mr. PRATT. I understand that the Senator from Vermont concedes the point that has been made by the Senator from North Carolina, that, as the law stands at present, the assignee may proceed against any of the debtors of the bankrupt, in the district court or in the circuit court of the United States, no matter what may be the amount of the debts, though the debts sued do not exceed five dollars. If that be the condition of the law I have no hesitation in saying that it ought to be changed, and I shall vote most cheerfully for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has modified it in such a way as to make it acceptable to us too.

Mr. PRATT. I should have preferred an amendment that would have put the assignee, in bringing suits upon debts due to the bankrupt, on the same footing precisely that the bankrupt occupied before he was proceeded against in bankruptcy, so that the assignee would have the same power that the bankrupt had before he became a bankrupt in suing the debts that were owing to him. Thus if the debt exceeds $500, and in its origination the parties belonged to different States, the Federal courts would have jurisdiction; but if it were under that sum, the debt must be sued in the State courts, and the Federal courts would have no jurisdiction.

Now contemplate for a moment the unmitigated hardships of the law as it is. A debtor here is compelled to answer a claim due to the bankrupt, which yesterday he could have been sued upon only in his own domestic forum, before a justice of the peace, or before his county court, where he could have summoned his witnesses and made his defense without any great expense; but, lo and behold, to-day the creditor becomes a bankrupt, and his assignee brings suit upon the same debt precisely in the Federal court, three or four hundred miles distant from the place where the debt originated, and where the defense is to be proved. I submit that is a great hardship to the debtor; it is a great hardship to the bankrupt's estate also; because if the claim be a litigated one the assignee must have his witnesses at the Federal court as well as the debtor; and thus both sides must transport their witnesses hundreds of miles for the purpose of trying the issue whether this debt should be paid or not, whether any valid defense exists against it. I should have preferred greatly, as I said, that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina had been something like this:

That the assignee in bringing suits for the collection of debts due the bankrupt shall be required to sue in the same courts the bankrupt would in case bankruptcy had not occurred.

Put the assignee upon the same footing in enforcing the debts due the bankrupt that the bankrupt would occupy in case he had been proceeded against. There is justice. The moment you depart from that rule you impose a very great hardship upon the debtor, without any fault of his whatever. If it is a plain, ordinary debt against which he has no defense, the costs are doubled or trebled; and if it be a case where he thinks he has a valid defense against the estate, he had better pay the debt at once than attempt to make his defense, because he must transport his witnesses, be they few or many, hundreds of miles in some of the States in order to make his defense good.

Therefore, sir, while I shall support the amendment in its present form, I would greatly have preferred to put the assignee in all cases of litigation upon the same footing precisely that the bankrupt occupied before he was proceeded against.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to trouble the Senate with another amendment. At the end of section 1 of the bankrupt act, I propose to add the following words, making a new section:

The courts of record of the several States having superior jurisdiction and jury trials, shall have like jurisdiction of all matters of bankruptcy arising under the laws of the United States, and shall have power in all respects to administer such laws. And all orders, judgments, and decrees of such State courts made and passed in that behalf shall be deemed and held to be of the same force and effect, to all intents and purposes, as if the same had been made in the courts of the United States having jurisdiction of such matters: Provided, nevertheless, Any party to any matter or suit in bankruptcy in any such State court shall have the same right of appeal, or other method, to remove such matter or suit to the highest court of review in such State, as may be allowed by the laws thereof.

My object in offering this amendment, and I will detain the Senate but a moment, is to popularize this law as much as possible and to allow the people in their own immediate neighborhoods to administer it as nearly as may be, and not only to popularize it in that point of view, but to cut down the costs incident to the administration of the law. Any one who has had any experience in the practice of the Federal courts must know that the costs incurred in those courts necessarily are from 50 to 100 per cent. greater than the like costs in the State courts in like matters. My amendment is offered with that view.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that that amendment will not answer, for this reason: The Constitution requires that we shall have a uniform system of bankruptcy. The law regulates the claims and credits that exist between the individuals of different States without regard to State lines at all, that being the very object of a bankrupt law. Now, to subject the interpretation and construction of this act to the State courts, with no review, no possibility of review by the Federal courts, would seem to me like passing a law which in its very nature belongs to the Federal Government, and then delegating our power and committing all its provisions to the various interpretations of thirty-seven different States.

Mr. MORTON. I would inquire of the author of the amendment if he intends by that to confer upon the State courts any power that they do not possess under the State laws?

Mr. MERRIMON. My object, I will state in reply to the Senator from Indiana, is simply to give the State courts authority to administer this law, and to exercise all powers necessary to administer it.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator pardon me for putting a question in the same line? Does he suppose that, by incorporating this section in the bill, the State courts in North Carolina will be empowered to take jurisdiction of the estate of a bankrupt who had creditors in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, and authorize the officers of the State courts to go into those States and serve notices upon those creditors?

Mr. MERRIMON. They might possibly do it. More than that, sir, I would state, in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] that the district courts of the United States cannot go out of their districts to administer the bankrupt law. If an assignee in North Carolina desires to sue a party in New York, he has got to go to the district court in New York to collect the debt, and he must proceed in all respects through the district court of the United States when he asks relief in any matter pending before the court where he resides, and have any adjudication that he desires made there. So that the objection the Senator suggests by his question cannot arise.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to put this question to the Senator: whether in his opinion it is competent for Congress to confer any part of the judicial power of this nation on a State court?

Mr. MERRIMON. I think there is no doubt about it. I know that there are numerous acts of Congress that do confer such power. That difficulty occurred to my mind, and I looked at the authorities hastily this morning to see if there was any adjudication to the contrary. So far from finding any adjudication denying such power in Congress I found authority, which, to say the very least, is very high authority, sustaining by indirection the power which I propose to confer upon the State courts.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator permit me to read the judicial clause of the Constitution?

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation, &c.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is very true. The Congress would not have power to convert a State court into a Federal court, but that is not the proposition at all. The proposition is simply to authorize the State courts to administer a Federal law in this case as they do in five hundred other cases. Why, sir, the statutes of the United States expressly provide that the justices of the peace and all the judges of the several States shall exercise judicial functions in having parties arrested under the Federal laws, and brought into the Federal courts to be tried, for offenses against the laws of the United States. Sitting as a judge I have done it myself many times; and, indeed, I did it when the Federal authority found it, through their commissioners, impossible to do it. I refer now to cases of violations of the internal-revenue law. I have often issued a bench-warrant, had the party arrested and brought before me, and bound him over to the Federal court. I have done it in many instances, not only in the case of the internal-revenue law, but in other cases as well; and an act of Congress has conferred by general statute such powers upon the State courts.

But I have here an authority bearing on this subject showing that Judge Story, who I believe is pretty high authority in this country, believed that such power might be conferred upon the State courts. I read now from the case of Mitchell vs. The Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, which is reported in 2 Story's Circuit Court Reports, page 648. In commenting on the act of 1841, after quoting a section of the act, Judge Story uses these words:

It is clear that Congress has no right to require that the State courts shall entertain suits for such objects and purposes. The States in providing their own judicial tribunals have a right to limit, control, and restrict their judicial functions and jurisdiction, according to their own mere pleasure. They may refuse to allow suits to be brought there "arising under the laws of the United States" for many just reasons: first, that Congress are bound to provide such tribunals for themselves; secondly, that State courts are not subject to the legislation of Congress as to their jurisdiction; thirdly, that it may most materially interfere with the convenience of their own courts and the rights of their own citizens, and be attended with great expense to the State, as well as great delays in the administration of justice, to allow their courts to be crowded with suits arising under the laws of the United States; and fourthly, as in the present case, that it would involve the State courts in almost endless examinations and discussions of the principles and bearings of the bankrupt law, confessedly a system novel in our jurisprudence, intricate in its details, and involving questions exceedingly complicated and difficult in its practical operation. (Story's Circuit Court Reports, volume 2, page 656.)

I cite this not as authority to sustain the position which I take, but as indicating the opinion of that great and learned judge, and who was particularly great and reliable in expounding the Constitution of his country. It is manifest from what I have read, and not only from this case but other cases, that he thought such powers as I propose by this amendment may be conferred upon State courts.

It will be seen that this amendment does not propose to compel the State courts to administer this law; it only provides that the State courts may do it, and I believe that in the Southern and Western States, where the Federal courts sit at long distances from many of the people to whom Federal jurisprudence must be administered, the States rather than subject their citizens to the oppression, and annoyance, and distress of going such long distances at great expense would permit their courts to administer the law, rather than to allow it to be confined entirely to the Federal courts.

Then there is another consideration that prompted me in offering this amendment. In the Southern States, except in those portions of them that are highly commercial—and I may say the same of the Western States—four-fifths of the matters in bankruptcy involve estates of trifling magnitude; and because this is so, and because the costs in administering this law through the Federal courts are so great, the creditors in these small estates never realize anything from it; and hence a great deal of the odium that the law has come into. The State courts could take jurisdiction of these small cases in the agricultural portions of our country, and administer the law promptly and cheaply; the creditors would get a great deal more, and parties interested would suffer a great deal less, and the whole law would be administered at a great deal less cost.

I thought at one time whether it would not be wise to incorporate a provision that a certain number of creditors might make application to remove any bankruptcy case or proceeding from a State court, where it had been brought, into the Federal court. It is perfectly competent to do that; but as the law is to be administered in the State courts, if this amendment shall prevail, by a sort of comity between the State courts and the Federal courts, the State jurisdiction and the Federal jurisdiction, I thought it would be unwise and illiberal to say to the State courts, "After you have been courteous enough to take jurisdiction of this matter and administer the Federal law for us—after you have begun it, we lose confidence in you and take it from your jurisdiction;" and therefore I did not prepare any such provision. I think it unwise to do it.

Perhaps it may be said that we are afraid of the State courts. Sir, I trust the day will never come when the people of the United States shall be afraid of the integrity of each other; when the Federal Government shall be afraid of the State governments. The Federal Government is nothing without the State governments; the State governments are nothing without the Federal Government. Each supports the other; each is made for the other; and each within its sphere is a part of the other. When you distrust the people acting in their capacity as people composing the States, at the same moment and in the same way and in the same measure you distrust the people as making up a component part of the people of the Union. We have got to repose trust in the people acting in their State capacity just as the people have to repose trust in each other acting in their Federal capacity. I am willing, for one, to trust the State courts in the administration of this law with the same confidence that I would trust the Federal courts. I believe they will do it as faithfully and as honestly as the Federal courts; I am sure it will be so done in my State; and because it can be done so much more cheaply and conveniently, because it can relieve the people of much evil that amounts to downright oppression, I believe that the amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is an amendment of very great importance, one that I am sorry the Senate is not full to hear, because if it prevail, in my opinion there will be nothing left worth saving in the bankrupt law. In other words, it would in and of itself destroy the law as effectually as if you were to pass the House bill and say "repeal."

The first question that is presented is, whether this provision of my friend is constitutional. We are both of us sticklers for the Constitution of the United States, as every good citizen ought to be. Now, as has been suggested, where are you to find the uniformity which the Constitution of the United States requires, if you are to say that bankrupt proceedings are to be carried on in State courts as well as Federal courts, because, as my friend agrees, you can carry on no Federal proceeding in a State court except in accordance with State law and State permission. My friend does not contend, if I rightly understand him—and if I do not I hope he will correct me—that it is within the competence of Congress to require of a State court the performance of any such duty as this or any other duty that the Federal law is to put in force.

Mr. MERRIMON. I concur in that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We all agree to that. Therefore you are to leave it to the pleasure of the courts of thirty-seven States whether they will exercise bankruptcy jurisdiction or not; and if they are to exercise it, whether they will exercise it according to Federal principles, or according to a uniform rule, or according to their own. But, more than that, a State court has no liberty to depart from the institutions of its own State, and its own constitution and the law under which it is created declare what it may do; and when it undertakes to do anything else, then it violates the law and the constitution of its own State. Therefore, if this amendment were to be adopted you could provide one rule and one provision for their acting in one State, and another in another; and you must, unless it should happen that every one of the thirty-seven States should think exactly alike about the law and its administration, because this bankrupt law must not only be uniform in respect to the principles on which you proceed, but it is to be a uniform rule. There is to be one guide that begins at the beginning and goes to the end; and it was intended by the Constitution makers that there should be, if I correctly understand that instrument. Very well; now if you are to say, in this bill, that we submit it to the pleasure of thirty-seven States taken separately and each for itself to provide a system of bankruptcy, and to provide the machinery upon which this bankruptcy system upon its principles is to go on, then you send it to thirty-seven different tribunals which might or might not be uniform, as the case might be.

In the next place, the Constitution does not confer upon the States the power to establish any uniform system of bankruptcy. It does not leave to the State law any right to act upon the subject of bankruptcy at all. It says that the Congress of all the States—not some of the States, but the Congress of the United States—shall prescribe a system of bankruptcy.

Now if it needs State legislation and State law to carry this system of my friend into effect, where do you get the authority in the Federal Constitution for allowing the State will or the State wishes to affect the question at all? A State may make an insolvent law (it may call it a bankrupt law if it likes) for its own citizens, and for cases occurring after the passage of the law, and may discharge the debtor; but it cannot by that discharge affect the debtor's relations to any creditor who is not a citizen of the State in which the discharge takes place, unless he chooses voluntarily to come in. Where are your rights then, pray?

In the next place I disagree with my friend entirely as to the power of Congress in any case to confer upon the State courts any judicial powers or functions whatever. It violates in the first place the very principle of separation and independence which the Constitution and the makers of the Constitution intended should exist between the States, which were to be absolutely independent in respect to the matters that were left to them, and we to be absolutely independent in respect to the matters which were left to Congress. It did not intend to provide for any mixed remedies or mixed legislation; it intended to provide for two separate and distinct organizations, and each, within the sphere that was left to itself, exclusively was to be "the master of the situation," if I may use such an expression.

Now, where do you find yourself? You find yourself without any State law to carry these provisions into effect, even if there could be one, as plainly there cannot be as it seems to me. You find yourself turning this bankrupt law over to the courts of all the States, denying the very theory on which this uniformity was required; and that is that there should be but one law in commercial matters for the nation. You infract that theory to begin with, and then, coming to the Constitution itself, you are undertaking, by the intervention of Federal authority, to confer powers and to require duties to be performed by courts over whom you have no jurisdiction either to compel the performance of the power or to punish for the neglect of it.

My friend thinks the case from which he has read, in 2 Story's Reports, touches this question.

Mr. MERRIMON. I said by implication.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think, with all deference to my learned friend, that by implication it is exactly the other way. Mr. Justice Story says, with his usual elegant clearness:

It is clear that Congress has no right to require that the State courts shall entertain suits for such objects and purposes.

That is, even a suit by an assignee; Congress has no right to require that a State court shall allow an assignee to bring an action. Now, go on a little further and see what he says on the subject:

The courts which are to administer such a system (bankruptcy) must possess not only jurisdiction at law, but in equity; not only a right to proceed in a formal way, but to act summarily; not only to hold regular terms, but to be always open; not only to be bound to act, but to be governed by uniform rules and principles of interpretation and action, at least as far as, from the diversity of human judgments, such uniformity of rules, principles, and proceedings can be looked for in practice. But what can be expected from a hundred State courts, organized upon no uniform system, governed by no uniform jurisprudence, and in their jurisdiction and modes of proceeding admitting of almost endless diversities of practice and action? So far from any system of bankruptcy being capable of any uniformity of action throughout the United States under such circumstances, it would be in no two States, perhaps in no two tribunals of the same State, the same. And if every decision in a State tribunal was to be subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, instead of the proceedings in bankruptcy being completed, as the act of 1841, chapter 9, section 10, manifestly contemplates, within two years from their commencement, a half century might elapse before such a consummation.

That is what Mr. Justice Story says. Now look to the question of whether you can confer by any act of legislation of Congress, in any case, jurisdiction in a State court; because if you can in one case you can in another; certainly if you can in this case, where Congress is exclusively vested in terms with the right to provide a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States which shall be uniform everywhere, there is no other in the Constitution where you cannot. Now hear what the Supreme Court of the United States said in the case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, under the act for rendering fugitives from labor—the fugitive-slave law, as it is called—and I only read from the syllabus, so as not to take up the time of the Senate with this proposition, which involves to my mind perfectly fatal consequences:

The clause relating to fugitive slaves is found in the national Constitution, and not in that of any State.

So it is with the provision in regard to a uniform system of bankruptcy.

It might well be deemed an unconstitutional exercise of the power of interpretation to insist that the States are bound to provide means to carry into effect the duties of the national Government, whenever delegated or intrusted to them by the Constitution. On the contrary, the natural, if not the necessary, conclusion is, that the national Government, in the absence of all positive provisions to the contrary, is bound, through its own proper departments—legislative, executive, or judicial, as the case may require—to carry into effect all the rights and duties imposed upon it by the Constitution.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is good law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I submit to my friend how that can be good law, and his amendment be a good amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I think if the Senator from North Carolina will reflect a little more upon his amendment, he will see that it is wholly inadmissible. There are certain fundamental principles upon which we must all agree. One is that a State court has no jurisdiction but such as is conferred upon it by the State constitution and laws. Nothing can be clearer than that. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the Federal Government cannot confer upon a State court a jurisdiction not conferred upon it by the State constitution and laws.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator from Ohio whether the State courts do not exercise a jurisdiction under a statute of the United States in regard to a uniform system of naturalization, and whether the State court does not execute that law from beginning to end?

Mr. THURMAN. The State courts, I repeat, Mr. President, can have no jurisdiction except such as is conferred by the State constitution and laws, and Congress can confer upon a State court no jurisdiction beyond what is conferred upon it by the State constitution and laws; and if a State court does exercise a jurisdiction apparently under an act of Congress, it is because the State constitution has made it capable of receiving that jurisdiction. If the State constitution has not made it capable of receiving that jurisdiction, it cannot exercise it. Nothing can be clearer than that. What would be the right of the people of a State to establish their own constitution, to establish their own judicial system, if Congress had the power to enlarge that jurisdiction of their courts to suit the views of a majority in Congress? That seems to me to be quite too plain for argument.

The question, then, is, does this amendment of the Senator from North Carolina attempt to confer on the State courts a jurisdiction that is not conferred upon them by their State constitutions? Manifestly it does. Nay, it goes further than that; it attempts to confer upon a State court a jurisdiction that the people of the State cannot by their constitution confer upon it; in other words, it attempts to confer upon a State court a jurisdiction in bankruptcy, in execution of a bankrupt law of the United States, a power that the people of the State cannot by their constitution confer upon a State court at all. To show that I am not mistaken about this, let us see what the amendment is. It is to come in at the end of section 1, and it is to read as follows:

The courts of record of the several States having superior jurisdiction and jury trials shall have like jurisdiction of all matters of bankruptcy arising under the laws of the United States, and shall have power in all respects to administer such laws, and all orders, judgments, and decrees of such State courts made and passed in that behalf shall be deemed and held to be of the same force and effect to all intents and purposes as if the same had been made in the courts of the United States having jurisdiction of such matters.

That is to say, it gives precisely the same jurisdiction to a State court that is given to the district court of the United States. Now, mark, this is a very different thing from an assignee bringing a suit in a State court to recover a debt due to the bankrupt. There is no question in the world that that might be done if it were permitted by Congress. Why so? Because Congress would not confer any jurisdiction upon the State court in a case of that kind. The State court already has jurisdiction to entertain suits for the collection of debts; and when you have said by your bankrupt law that all the property, real and personal, of the bankrupt and all his rights of action, legal and equitable, shall vest in the assignee who may sue for and recover the same; when you have thus vested him with the title, either to the property or to the chose in action, he may recover in any court having jurisdiction in such cases, if there is nothing in the law of the United States to prevent his suing in that court; and hence it would be perfectly admissible for us to permit an assignee in bankruptcy to go into a State court to collect debts wherever that State court had the jurisdiction to entertain a suit for the collection of debts of the amount and nature that were involved in the suit.

That is one thing; but to confer upon a State court bankruptcy powers, to enable it to make all the orders and decrees in bankruptcy that we authorized the district court of the United States to do, is to attempt to confer upon it a jurisdiction not conferred by the State constitution, and which the State constitution could not confer if the people had so willed it. For that reason it seems to me very clear indeed that this amendment ought not to be adopted.

But if there were no constitutional difficulty in the way, the practical difficulties would be insuperable. How are you to administer a bankrupt law in all the superior courts of the States in that way? Take the case of the court of common pleas in the State of Ohio, that holds two or three terms a year, and whose vacations are greater than its terms; can you administer a bankrupt law in a court like that? And if you are to administer it in a court like that, I want to know another thing: which court is it that is to have the jurisdiction? A man goes into bankruptcy. To go into bankruptcy, he must take certain steps. His first step is to file a petition in the district court of the United States. If he is put into involuntary bankruptcy, his creditors file the petition. Now, how is that to get out of the Federal court into the State court; and, if so, into what State court is it to get? We have in Ohio eighty-eight courts of common pleas. Then we have nine district courts, then we have a supreme court, and then we have eighty-eight probate courts, which are courts of record too. Now, into which one of these courts, amounting to nearly two hundred in number, is the bankrupt case to go, and how is it to get there? Who is to choose the court which is to administer this law? And if you could get it into one of them, what are you to do with the long vacation, sometimes amounting to six months at a time, in these State courts, when your whole proceeding of bankruptcy would be blocked up?

I think my friend must see that his amendment, as it is drawn up, is entirely inadmissible. If he wishes merely to provide that nothing in this act contained shall prevent an assignee from suing for a debt in a State court, if that is what he means, there is no constitutional objection to that that I see, because the State courts are competent to entertain suits for the collection of debts, and the property being vested in the bankrupt, and the right of action being vested in him, he may sue in the State court, just as he could recover a tract of land by ejectment in a State court. That is one thing; but the Senator's amendment goes away beyond that, and provides that these State courts shall have the same jurisdiction as the district courts, and that their proceedings shall to all intents and purposes have the same effect as if they were proceedings of the district court. That I humbly submit is entirely inadmissible under the Constitution, and if admissible, it would be destructive of the law.

Mr. MERRIMON. It seems to me that the strongest objection to my proposition is that it has not yet been thoroughly debated.

As to the argument of my very learned friend who has just taken his seat, I deny the premise with which he starts out, and if that is not true, then his argument must fail. I do not agree with him in saying that it is impossible that Congress has power to confer upon a State court any jurisdiction at all; and without going into a discussion of any particular provision of the Constitution I cite the uniform legislation of the country from the earliest period of the Government down to the present time in support of the view that I present, without much preparation, and I cite this clause, under the head of "Arrests" in Brightly's Digest, page 90:

For any crime or offense against the United States the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any justice of the peace or other magistrate of any of the United States, where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by this act has cognizance of the offense.

That act was passed in 1789, and has remained upon our statute-book ever since; and if opportunity would allow I could find authority—judicial decisions—sustaining that provision of this statute as entirely valid.

Mr. THURMAN. What provision is that?

Mr. MERRIMON. The act of 1789, authorizing the judges and justices of the peace of the several States to hold parties to bail to answer in the United States courts for offenses against the laws of the United States.

Then, again, Congress has conferred upon the State courts authority in matters of naturalization; Congress has conferred upon the State courts power to regulate the imprisonment of United States criminals in the State jails; and if time were allowed me in this running debate to hunt up the authorities and bring them to the attention of the Senate, I could find a variety of decisions sustaining the position that I take.

But, sir, to go back to the argument made against the amendment which I propose by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] He says that it destroys that uniformity of the bankrupt law which is required by the Constitution of the United States. I do not agree with him in that view. This amendment does not propose to allow the States to pass a bankrupt law or to abate it one jot or one tittle. It simply confers upon the State courts authority to administer the Federal law, as made by Congress; and there is the distinction. If this amendment should be adopted, the State courts would have no power to interfere with the provisions of the bankrupt law in any respect whatever. They are bound, if they shall undertake to administer it, to administer it as it is prescribed in the statute-book of the United States. I say, therefore, that the objection of the Senator from Vermont, upon the ground that the amendment destroys the uniformity of the bankrupt law required by the Constitution, is unfounded. All that this amendment proposes is to allow—not to compel, for we have no power to compel—the State courts to administer this law just as the statute I read awhile ago allows a State judge to arrest any one offending against the laws of the United States, just as the act of Congress allows the State courts to naturalize a party, just as the statute allows the authorities of the several States to make regulations for detaining prisoners of the United States in State jails. If the State authorities in one case could administer the law, I ask my honorable friends why Congress cannot authorize the State courts to administer this law as well as any other law?

I repeat that my purpose is not to abate one jot or one tittle of the law, but simply to give the State courts the power to administer this law so much more cheaply and expeditiously and conveniently to the people than can possibly be done through the Federal courts.

But, sir, while my honorable friend from Vermont was going on with his speech, and stating this distinction he insists upon between the State courts and the Federal courts, and denying the power of Congress to confer any jurisdiction upon the State courts, I desired to call his attention to a provision of the Constitution, which is very material here, it seems to me, and which goes to show that this bankrupt law in all its provisions is just as much binding upon the State courts, and they are as much bound to administer it where it comes under their jurisdiction, as if it were a statute passed by the State itself. Article 6 of the Constitution, in the second clause, provides in these words:

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

And here now is the material part:

And the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Here is another provision of the Constitution that is material for my purpose, and which shows that the power that I contend for does exist:

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

So that the State courts, by reason of the relation which exists between the Federal courts and the several States, are absolutely bound in many respects, in many incidental ways, to administer this law; and if they can administer it to any extent, if they can administer it in part, why can they not administer it in whole? Therefore it is clear, it seems to me, that Congress has the power to confer this authority.

Then, objection is made as to the expediency of it. It is said the State courts are not adapted to it.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the Senator leaves the other point, will he answer me a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will if I can.

Mr. THURMAN. There must be a uniform law of bankruptcy. If the State courts are to administer it, how will it be uniform when, according to the constitution and laws of some of the States, parties can be witnesses in their own behalf, and according to the constitution or laws of other States they cannot be? Will that be a uniform system of bankruptcy which allows the bankrupt to be a witness, or the creditor to be a witness, or the assignee to be a witness in one State, and right across the State line, in another State, the law does not permit such a thing?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am glad to be able to give the Senator what I conceive to be an answer, and a perfect one, to his question. If the State court undertakes to administer the Federal law, it must administer it as it is, and therefore when a witness shall be offered in a similar case to that which the Senator puts, in a State court, where he would not be a competent witness under the State law in some litigation and yet he would be under the Federal law, the judge administering the Federal law, and being bound by it, must admit the witness.

But it is said that we will have law administered in thirty-seven different ways and it will be administered under thirty-seven different administrations. I deny that, with all respect. If the State courts undertake to administer this law, they must exercise the powers conferred by the law as they are provided in the act, and they must adjust their proceedings accordingly as the act directs. How easily that can be done every lawyer knows who has any experience in a court of equity. The judge makes his orders, and shapes his decrees to suit the case and the convenience of the matter pending before him.

But it is said there would be thirty-seven different classes of decisions, and therefore the amendment is inexpedient. Why, sir, it may be that in one State one construction will be put upon one clause of the statute, and in another State another construction will be put upon it; but if that is an objection to the State courts, it is likewise an objection to the district courts of the United States. I suppose that there are at least one hundred district courts in the United States, and the judges of those courts do not hold uniformly in reference to many of the clauses of the bankrupt law. The judge in my district holds one way; the judge in my honorable friend's district holds another way, touching many matters that come before them respectively, and where their jurisdiction is the last, there is no appeal from such ruling; so that there are conflicting decisions about the bankrupt law, just as there have been conflicting decisions about many statutes of the United States on other subjects. Constructions have been placed by judges in many localities different from constructions made by judges in other localities; so that, it seems to me, that objection amounts to nothing.

Then, sir, I repeat what I said a moment ago—and I regret I am not able to cite many authorities that the hurry of this debate has not allowed me to refer to—that if this amendment shall prevail, it will cut out a feature of the present bankrupt law that operates oppressively, especially upon those sections of the country that are agricultural in their character, where the country is sparsely populated, and where the class of suits taken into a bankrupt court embrace, comparatively, a trifling amount of property.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, the question involved in this amendment is of such importance that I trust I shall be pardoned for adding one word to what has been said in opposition to it. It proposes certainly a very radical change in the law. It proposes a practice and a method that have never been known to any bankrupt law in this nation. I am not aware that in all the discussions that have been had upon this subject under any law that we have ever had, or under the law of 1867, this proposition has ever been made at any time. It is, therefore, a most anomalous provision, to begin with. It proposes a most radical change in the administration of the bankrupt law, and we are called upon now, when we have almost perfected the amendments which have been reported from the committee and the bill is about to be reported to the Senate, upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, to introduce a change that is the most radical that can be imagined or proposed.

I understand my friend to place his amendment, in the first place, largely upon the ground that it will tend to popularize the law, that it will tend to cheapen its administration. I suggest to my friend, if he wants to be radical in that respect, so far as cheapening its administration is concerned, it might be as well for him to strike out all fees, all emoluments under it; and if he wants to popularize it, he can strip it of very many of its provisions and make it so popular that the people will be constantly clamoring for it in every portion of the country. He might popularize it, aside from any constitutional difficulty, by putting it in the power of a justice of the peace to administer this law; but he does not propose anything of that kind.

Now, I humbly submit, Mr. President, that while it is all well enough in the passage of this bill that we should have reference to the popular will, we must remember that we are making a uniform system, giving a uniform system to all the States, and passing a Federal statute; and that we must have reference to our constitutional duties, and we must have reference to the character of the law we are about to pass, and the persons upon whom it is to operate.

But my friend from North Carolina will allow me to suggest in this connection one thing. It is to me most extraordinary that my friend should offer such an amendment as this. It seems to me he should be the last person to advocate this proposition. With all that has been said of State rights and the danger of concentration of power, and that the States must be protected in their constitutional rights, and that we must do nothing to interfere with those rights, my friend now proposes to impose upon all the courts of the nation the duty to carry out a Federal law, and, as I humbly submit, trenching upon their powers and rights and going into the State tribunals and asking and demanding that they shall administer a Federal statute.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend, unintentionally, does not state my position correctly. I do not command them to do it. I simply permit them to do it.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator says he simply permits them to do it, and he thus gives the power to the States to administer this Federal statute; and the courts of every State in the Union, according to what was said by him awhile ago, from the comity that obtains, would feel bound to do it according to his argument.

But I desire to suggest two or three things, aside from the constitutional difficulty, that it seems to me are in the way of his amendment. He says that these State courts may administer this bankrupt law. The intention is not that an assignee may bring suit to recover a debt, but that the bankrupt proceedings may be instituted originally before the State tribunals, and that all and every step under that law may be administered by State tribunals. Now, allow me to suggest to the Senator this difficulty: Suppose the State tribunals in the administration of this law shall be guilty of some fraud, some violation of duty, shall depart from what they are required to do under the Constitution and this law as we pass it; tell me where there is the power in the Federal Government to punish them for such violation of duty? Do you say that if the Federal Government has no power to punish, the State may do it? Where is the power? Under what statute have the State authorities power to punish a State tribunal for the violation of a Federal statute? They may violate their duty ever so much and be subject ever so much to impeachment, and yet there is no tribunal on earth that can punish them. However much they may be faithless, there is no power to punish them for a departure from duty.

But the amendment of the Senator further provides:

Provided nevertheless, Any party to any matter or suit in bankruptcy in any such State court shall have the same right of appeal, or other method, to remove such matter or suit to the highest court of review in such State as may be allowed by the laws thereof.

What "laws thereof?" By the "laws thereof" touching this matter, I suppose; but suppose they pass no law touching this matter, then where is the right to have it reviewed in the higher courts in the State? But not only that; we are providing for a uniform system of bankruptcy, and we give the power now for review in the highest courts of each State, but there is no power on earth to have the decisions of the highest State courts reviewed in the highest court of the Federal Government, and what becomes of your uniformity then?

It has been suggested that these State courts have administered the naturalization laws. So they have; but there is a very great difference between that provision and what is proposed by the Senator. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." It provides that Congress shall have power "to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." So far as the administration of the naturalization laws is concerned there is no judicial power exercised within the meaning of the Constitution. That power might be conferred upon a commissioner. There is no jury trial; there is no step or proceeding that at all approximates or assimilates to a trial by jury or a trial in court, and that power, therefore, might be conferred upon a commissioner just as well as on a judge, and the judge acts as a judge and not as a court.

But let me submit another difficulty. The law provides that so far as the administration of this bankrupt law is concerned, as I now remember, that the district courts shall be continuously open for the hearing of causes and the closing up of estates. Now, extend the same provision to the State courts, and where will you be? We know practically that it is utterly impossible for these State courts to be continuously open, for they are from time to time upon their circuit attending to business. So far as the district judge is concerned, however, the law provides that his court shall be continuously open for the purpose of closing up these estates.

Now, Mr. President, I have nothing further to say upon this subject. The constitutional objection has been pointed out. It seems to me that this amendment is a step as strong as any that can be possibly taken in the direction of invading and infringing upon the powers and rights of the States and the courts of the States in the administration of justice. This law, it seems to me, should be administered by one tribunal, and that tribunal a tribunal of the Federal Government. If you now provide that it shall be in the power of the creditors of a bankrupt to take him into all the numberless State tribunals of this nation, it ceases to be uniform, and you will have "confusion worse confounded" from the very time you make this provision.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not. I appeal to my friend to withdraw that motion until we finish this bill. I think we can do it in an hour or two, and have the matter disposed of.

REFERENCES TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the attention of the House for a moment on a point of order. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] this morning offered a bill for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the Chair declined to make that reference, holding that it was not in order to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on that call. The gentleman thought his right to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union rested on rule 43, which is as follows:

When a resolution shall be offered, or a motion made, to refer any subject, and different committees shall be proposed, the question shall be taken in the following order:

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; the Committee of the Whole House; a standing committee; a select committee.

That has no reference to the Monday morning call. That rule, the forty-third, was made to relieve the difficulty that grew out of the forty-second rule, which reads as follows:

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged.

When you came to the question of commitment, the question arose what should be the order, whether one committee should have priority over another; and the forty-third rule was made in order to determine which should have priority. When a matter is before the House for debate, and a motion comes up to commit it or refer it, then the precedence is given to the Committee of the Whole. But on the Monday morning call the rule states that the Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave, and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred without debate to their appropriate committees. Now, if the Chair during the Monday morning hour should allow gentlemen to refer bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the Calendar would be entirely overloaded. There would be no getting through the Calendar. Nothing can by right go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until it is reported back from one of the committees of the House. That has been the uniform ruling of the Chair, though possibly, without attention being called thereto, bills may have been so referred.

CLAIMS AGAINST CHILI.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move to suspend the rules, so that I may offer, and the House adopt, a resolution the object of which I will briefly state.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be first read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to suspend action upon the resolution of this House passed on Thursday, the 5th day of February, 1874, which requested copies of all papers on file in the Department of State in reference to claims of citizens of the United Statesa gainst the republic of Chili, until further action of this House in relation thereto.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. On Thursday last, just as the House was adjourning, in the midst of great confusion, a member offered a resolution—

That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, requested to transmit to this House copies of all papers on file in the Department of State in reference to claims of citizens of the United States against the republic of Chili.

No objection was made—probably the resolution was not heard by half a dozen members—and it was adopted.

On the next evening, too late to move a reconsideration, the Committee on Foreign Affairs received from the Secretary of State a letter in which he stated that the papers called for ran back to the commencement of the existence of the republic of Chili in 1824; that to comply with this request of the House would make it necessary to copy thousands and thousands of pages; that some of the papers are of a confidential nature; that some of them refer to matters now pending before the Senate, upon a convention between the United States and Chili now before the Senate for their action; and that in his judgment the House would not have adopted the resolution if they had understood its nature.

As the gentleman who offered the resolution is not now in his seat, all the Committee on Foreign Affairs desires is, that action upon that resolution be suspended until further order of the House. If the gentleman who offered it shall bring in anything further upon the subject, or will explain to the Committee on Foreign Affairs what it is that he desires to get, there will of course be no objection to giving him any information that he desires that will not require such enormous expense and this interference with the operations of the State Department.

I move that the rules be suspended and this resolution adopted.

The motion was seconded; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was communicated to the House by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate withdrew their request for the return of the concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following privileged resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, the 15th day of May next, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall declare this session of their respective Houses adjourned sine die.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 128, noes 32.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BECK said: I call for the yeas and nays. This is an effort to fix the day of adjournment, and then hold back important bills until near the close of the session and press them through.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it not be in order to put this resolution in a little different shape, so as to show its actual nature; that is to give to the Senate the power of determining whether we should adjourn at that time or not as they may see proper?

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 43 in the affirmative.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COTTON. Is this a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COTTON. I then move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, the gentleman from Massachusetts not calling the previous question upon his resolution.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is it in order to amend the resolution?

Mr. DAWES. I simply offered it in order to take the sense of the House, and see who were desirous of contributing to the dispatch of business. If any members are not, then, of course, they will vote against the resolution.

Mr. BECK. That is not a true presentation of the case. Those who vote for this resolution do it for the purpose of holding back revenue and other bills, and then crowding them through near the close of the session, on the plea that there is not time to consider and discuss them.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Kentucky is quite in the habit of announcing to the House the motives of other gentlemen.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] announced that those who voted against the proposition were opposed to the transaction of business.

Mr. DAWES. Wait one moment. I do not know that any other gentleman than myself knew that this resolution was to be offered, and therefore no man's motive entered into it but mine.

Mr. BECK. Then why did the gentleman say that those who voted against it were voting to delay business?

Mr. DAWES. I have not communicated my motive to the gentleman from Kentucky, and therefore it is gratuitous on his part to announce to the House what my motive was. I prefer to announce it myself. It was simply to follow the custom of past sessions, in suggesting to the House an early day of adjournment in order to facilitate the dispatch of business. If there is any measure likely to come before this House upon which the gentleman desires my record, I am ready at any time to consider it as long as the gentleman from Kentucky may desire and to make that record. But I suggest to my friend that unless we endeavor to dispatch our business, the middle of July or the middle of August will be the time at which we shall adjourn.

I do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that we shall adjourn exactly upon the 15th of May; but it may contribute, in this House or the other, to dispatch in business if we signify to the other branch that we will try and be ready, by attending to the business of the House, to adjourn by the middle of May, if they will co-operate with us. I thought this was an innocent proposition until I heard from my friend from Kentucky that it originated in improper motives. I may be mistaken as to my motive, but I had not supposed it was anything improper.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Massachusetts announced that all members who would vote against this resolution were doing it because they did not want to attend to business promptly.

Mr. DAWES. I have made no such announcement.

Mr. BECK. The record will show that the gentleman did so announce five minutes ago.

Mr. DAWES. If the record contains any such statement as coming from me, it is because I did not know what I was saying. I have not been in the habit of undertaking to state what other men's motives are. They have the same right to their independent action here that I have to mine. I do not impugn any man's motive for voting against the resolution; nor do I permit any gentleman to impugn mine for offering it.

I have stated frankly and fairly what induced me to offer the resolution. If a majority of the House do not desire to do anything toward bringing the session to an early close, they will dispose of this resolution accordingly. I simply state that in my opinion it will contribute something to hastening a close of this session if we intimate that we will try to bring this session to a close somewhere about the middle of May.

Mr. BECK. One word. The gentleman from Massachusetts could have brought this proposition up when it could be debated. He brought it here and demanded its passage without allowing any member to say a word. Therefore I objected.

Mr. DAWES. Not three minutes ago the Speaker announced that I had omitted to call the previous question on this resolution.

Mr. BECK. Then bring it up for debate.

Mr. DAWES. It is as much open to debate as any measure ever offered at that desk. My colleague here [Mr. BUTLER] proposed to offer an amendment. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] proposes to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means. I have thrown no obstacle in the way of considering this resolution in the broadest manner, and as fully as any measure ever brought before the House.

I am surprised that my friend from Kentucky should have taken alarm at so innocent a proposition as a suggestion that we ought to try to adjourn by the middle of May. More than that, I am quite surprised, after the gentleman's long association with me here, that he has taken the liberty to say that I have offered this proposition from any other motive than that which is patent on the face of the paper.

Mr. BECK. I know, Mr. Speaker, it is almost a crime to say anything against the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES;] but I want to say that I object to pushing this matter through without debate, because we have been here two months and eight days, and only one of the regular appropriation bills out of eleven or twelve has passed this House. No measure in relation to the currency, no measure in relation to the tariff, has been considered in the House. We are now asked to adjourn on the 15th of May, only about three months hence, though we have thus far spent over two months in doing nothing. I believe that the effect of this resolution if adopted will be to crowd all the legislation of this Congress into the last ten days of the session under a suspension of the rules, when, as we know by experience heretofore, matters have to be passed without consideration except such as they receive from three members of the House and three members of the Senate, constituting what is known as a conference committee, who do not even print what they present, and whose propositions no member of the House can vote upon intelligently. In this way a vast amount of vicious legislation will be crowded in, if this resolution be adopted.

Whether that is the purpose of the gentleman from Massachusetts or not, the effect will be to do that. To that I am opposed. I want the appropriation bills passed, and I will vote to sit here every night and every day, Saturdays included, stopping all debate except on business, and press to the utmost to get through as early as we possibly can. But until we have done more than we have done now I object to fixing a day for adjournment, when everything will be held back and nothing done intelligently.

Mr. DAWES. It is because I feel as the gentleman from Kentucky feels about the session I introduce the resolution. It is because I feel as if we had not made quite progress enough that I wanted to fix, two or three months ahead, a day as an inducement for us to do more work here—to dispatch business. I am of opinion, from experience I have had, a postponement in fixing a day tends directly to the mischief to which the gentleman from Kentucky alludes. So long as we have no day fixed beforehand we work along as we have done for two, going on three, months without having passed but one appropriation bill.

When we see the end in two or three months ahead, and a day has been fixed, then we shall be likely to push our appropriation bills and other necessary bills along. I tried here on Friday to induce the House to work on Saturday, but I failed. I thought I would offer this resolution to-day, and let it go to the other body, to have some time fixed, far enough ahead, so that we could work up to it, to see if that might not have some such effect.

If any gentleman thinks I desire to circumscribe, or circumvent, or prevent, any legislation here, he mistakes the purpose of the resolution. The purpose of the resolution is to secure just that end, and if you put it two or three months ahead we will then work up with our appropriation bills.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, without dealing with the motives of anybody, I desire to suggest the effect of the adoption of such a resolution as that proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts can be evil, and evil only. I believe that deliberation is an essential element in judicious legislation; and I for one am prepared to protest against the frequent use of the previous question upon important legislation.

The overwhelming majority which the party to which I am attached has had in this House for years has made it resort quite too frequently to the previous question upon the passage of a law, gagging those who would resist its passage or modify its provisions. But I think the country would regard gentlemen who are paid by the year and not by the day as performing their duty more faithfully if they gave a month or two in a long session to a free discussion of the more important bills of the session. I hope, therefore, this motion will be voted down.

I remember during the last Congress, or the one which preceded it, we began the discussion of a tariff bill——

Mr. COTTON. I supposed I had the floor all this time, and was merely yielding to gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. There is too much confusion in the House. The pending resolution is debatable within very narrow limits.

Mr. COTTON. I supposed I had the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe I have the floor. Shall I proceed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. KELLEY. I was remarking we had before us a tariff bill containing very many provisions, but soon after its discussion began it was resolved all debate should close on a certain day. And what was the result? The House passed a small part in the Committee of the Whole, and the greater part of the provisions of that bill were passed without a word of debate. What was the further result? Why, sir, the same article appeared in the bill on the free list and at a duty of 10 per cent. and at a duty of 20 per cent. And that was not an exceptional article. The wildest measures suggested to the imagination of any gentleman were proposed, and because Congress had fallen into a mood——

Mr. COTTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary question. Am I entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair indulged the gentleman to make his motion, but as he did not proceed to debate the matter the floor was assigned to others. The Chair will recognize the gentleman, but the Chair cannot allow this question to run into any prolonged debate.

Mr. KELLEY. When the bill found its way to the committee of conference it was impossible to say what the determinations of this House had been, so many articles were put in under conflicting duties.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order, when a gentleman has presented a resolution and has not called the previous question or moved it under a suspension of the rules, to enter a motion that the rules be suspended and the resolution passed? I make that suggestion, because the House seems ready for the question.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. COTTON,] that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Pending that I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether that is not like any other motion to suspend the rules in taking precedence of all pending questions.

The SPEAKER. Of course. Every other motion is subordinated to a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. COTTON. I desire the previous question on the motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. That brings the House to a vote; and if the previous question is not seconded the House will be brought to a vote on the resolution itself.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I rise to a point of order. Has not the order been made that the yeas and nays should be taken on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Is it in order, then, to entertain a motion to refer the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is. The yeas and nays may be ordered on a motion not to take effect for six weeks. After the yeas and nays have been ordered, that does not cut off any subsequent motion, unless the first name on the roll be called. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and on that demands the previous question. The Chair will state the effect of the motion. If the previous question be seconded, the effect is to bring the House directly to a vote upon that motion; if it is negatived, the House is brought to a vote upon the main motion, on agreeing to the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move to lay the whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. I made the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, pending the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to send it to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know that the gentleman from Maine made that motion.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Certainly I made that motion.

The SPEAKER. It is necessary that the gentleman should have the floor before he can make a motion. The gentleman did not have the floor.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Can I make the motion now?

The SPEAKER. That is another thing.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the several pending questions. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] introduced the resolution for passage, and on that the yeas and nays were ordered. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] moves the previous question on his motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means; pending which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] moves that the resolution be laid on the table; pending which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] moves that the rules be suspended and the resolution passed. Is there a seconder on that motion?

Mr. COX. On which motion?

The SPEAKER. On the motion for suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

Mr. COX. Does not the motion to lay the resolution on the table take precedence of the motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The motion is to suspend all rules.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, there were—ayes 67, noes 65; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, and Mr. HALE of Maine, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 100.

So the motion was not seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] that the resolution do lie upon the table.

Mr. DAWES. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 40.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to suspend the rules, and refer the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is right.

Mr. COX. I raise the point of order that that motion cannot be made.

The SPEAKER. Why?

Mr. COX. Does not a motion to lay on the table, lay on the table everything that adheres to it?

The SPEAKER. A motion to lay on the table is a motion under the rules. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] is a motion to suspend the rules, and, among others, the very rule which enables the gentleman from Pennsylvania to move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COX. Then that comes in subsequently.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but it suspends it all the same.

Mr. STORM. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules while the House is voting?

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered; they have been ordered on two questions. But that does not affect in the slightest the right to move a suspension of the rules.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, and refer the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means, there were—ayes 97, noes 54.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. KELLEY and Mr. SPEER called for the yeas and nays on the question of suspending the rules.

Mr. DAWES. Take a division first.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will order tellers on this question.

No objection being made, tellers were ordered; and Mr. DAWES and Mr. KELLEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 108, noes 60.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. KELLEY, that the resolution be laid upon the table; on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 128, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Ashe, Atkins, Barber, Bass, Beck, Biery, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Buckner, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cessna, John B. So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. COTTON to refer the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. COTTON. Upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to upon a division—ayes 117, noes 26.

Mr. COTTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN moved that the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that Congress should not adjourn until some measures have been enacted providing for reform in the present system of the currency; also on the subject of transportation, and for a more economical administration of the Government.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that resolution will be adopted; but suggest to the gentleman to add to it "at as early a day as practicable."

Mr. FORT. Let it remain as it is; it is just right now.

The question was upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBURN and Mr. STORM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 86, noes not counted.

So the motion was seconded.

The rules were then suspended, two-thirds voting in the affirmative, and the resolution was adopted.

ELECTION CONTEST—ARKANSAS.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in writing, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That W. W. Wilshire is entitled prima facie to a seat in the Forty-third Congress as Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Arkansas, without prejudice to the right of Thomas M. Gunter, claiming to have been elected thereto, to contest his right to said seat upon the merits.

Mr. LAMAR, on behalf of the minority members of the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in writing, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the contested-election case from the third district of Arkansas be recommitted to the Committee on Elections with instructions to report upon the merits of the case who is entitled to represent said district in this House.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, be laid upon the table and printed; and I give notice that at an early day I will call up the report for action in this House.

The motion was agreed to.

BUFFALO RIVER, NEW YORK.

Mr. BASS. I move that the rules be suspended in order that I may introduce, and the House pass, a bill to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of the Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of December 18, 1873.

The bill, which was read, appropriates $20,000 to be expended by the Secretary of War for dredging and protecting the navigable channel at the mouth of the Buffalo River, and for removing the sand-bar formed by the great gale of December last at that point, the sum appropriated to be available upon the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] asks consent to make a brief explanation. If there be no objection he will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object to the gentleman making a statement. But I trust that inasmuch as this bill is out of the usual course of legislation, some little time for consideration may be allowed.

Mr. CONGER. This appropriation is proposed to be made now as an advance in part of the appropriation which would be made in the river and harbor appropriation bill for the harbor of Buffalo; it is to be deducted from the amount of the appropriation that would be reported hereafter. This appropriation is now needed for immediate use, to meet what appears to be a very urgent necessity.

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, in the month of December last one of the most extraordinary gales to which we were ever subjected occurred at the port of Buffalo, the result of which was that a sand-bar was drifted across what had been the navigable channel entering the port—a channel through which, as gentlemen of the House are aware, a large amount of commerce passes annually. Unless immediate steps be taken to remove this obstruction, the commerce of the West, which approaches that harbor early in the spring, immediately upon the opening of navigation, before the regular appropriation bill will have passed this House, will be greatly obstructed; the vessels will be required to anchor outside the harbor and the cargoes be delivered by lighters. This would impose upon the grain now in store in Chicago, Milwaukee, and other ports upon the western lakes, an expense which would amount to a very heavy tax upon the transportation of that production to the sea-board and abroad.

We do not desire that this appropriation shall be anything more than an anticipation of a part of the regular appropriation, to be taken into account by the committee having in charge the regular river and harbor bill.

I hold in my hand a communication from the major of engineers of the United States Army having in charge the work at Buffalo, stating in substance the facts I have recited, and saying that unless immediate relief can be had—unless the sand which has thus been carried to that point by an extraordinary and almost unprecedented gale can be removed—very great disaster may be expected and very great hardships to the commerce of the western lakes.

Permit me to say that the amount of commerce ordinarily passing through the channel thus obstructed amounts on the average annually to more than the entire foreign exportation of our cereals. More than seventy-three million bushels of grain—rye, oats, wheat, barley, and corn—passed through this channel last year. We ask that this appropriation may be made in anticipation of the regular appropriation which would be reported hereafter by the committee having this subject in charge. We think that the unprecedented circumstances justify this prompt action.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BASS. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is understood that if this appropriation is now made in advance, the amount thus appropriated will be taken out of the regular amount that would go for the improvement of that harbor?

Mr. BASS. Certainly; this appropriation will be taken into consideration by the committee in reporting the regular river and harbor bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it is understood that we are merely anticipating what would be done in the regular bill and what is really a part of it, I certainly shall not object; for the measure seems to me a wise one.

Mr. BASS. That is so understood.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust the House will remember that it is so understood, and will bear it in mind when the river and harbor bill comes up.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is so understood by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GARFIELD. If so, I do not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to this subject. We have, in several instances, made appropriations of this kind to meet pressing emergencies, once in the case of the Des Moines Rapids Canal, and also in two other instances; but our action was taken in those cases upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War. The defect in this application to the House is, that there is no recommendation from the Secretary of War or from the Engineer Corps. There is simply a letter addressed to the authorities of Buffalo by the local engineer having charge of this work, pointing out the advantages which might accrue from an immediate appropriation. I should not object at all if proper reports were made by the Engineer Corps. If the Chief of Engineers had brought the subject to the attention of the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War had recommended Congress to make an appropriation, it would then, I think, be highly proper to make it. But I submit to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that the charge that Congress is appropriating money not asked for by the Departments has been very pertinently made since this Congress convened. Here is an appropriation not asked for by the War Department, not suggested by the Chief of the Engineer Corps. I have said to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BASS] that of course we all understand the importance of the harbor of Buffalo, and that if this appropriation were recommended for the present fiscal year by the proper and responsible officers of the Government, I would then acquiesce in the proposition promptly. The objection is, that this case comes to us recommended simply in the form of a letter from the local engineer to the authorities at Buffalo.

Mr. BASS. May I have this communication read?

Mr. GARFIELD. I supposed the appropriation was recommended by the Department?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then there is point in what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has said.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should not object if the appropriation were recommended by the War Department.

Mr. BASS. I would like to have read the communication from the major of engineers having this work in charge.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why not let the bill go to the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report at any time?

Mr. HOLMAN. I should not object to that.

Mr. BASS. If it be required that this bill shall be referred to the committee, and that we shall then await its report before passing the measure and sending it to the other branch of Congress, navigation will have opened before the bill can become a law, and the entire extent of the disaster now apprehended will have occurred.

The lake flows down by the middle of April, within two months from this time, and hence, unless immediate steps can be taken for the dredging absolutely necessary to be done, it will amount to a tax of from five to ten cents a bushel upon western grain, which comes down from the West through the port of Buffalo seeking shipment at the sea-board. The tax will be almost destructive. If it be necessary this delay should occur, the damage will have taken place, and there will be no relief to be obtained from appropriation after navigation opens. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER'S OFFICE,
Buffalo, New York, January 29, 1874.

SIR: I beg to call your attention, * * * to the exigency which has arisen at the mouth of Buffalo River, due to the unprecedented and sudden deposit of sand at the head of the light-house pier. This deposit, which has been slowly accumulating for years, was suddenly and most unexpectedly reinforced to an alarming degree by the late extraordinary gale of December, 1873, which transferred to that point in one day a large mass of sand, which had been banked up against the sea-wall for many years. The result is a large bar, which, very fortunately for the commerce of Buffalo, has not yet infringed upon the river channel, having been kept back by the scouring of repeated currents, due to high water recurring at intervals in Buffalo River, the effect of the open winter, and liberal rain-fall. Nevertheless the danger is imminent, that when the ice in the lake shall break up in the spring and begin to scour along the shore of Lake Erie into the Niagara River, the small bergs, commonly known as "clampers," will scrape this bar, or a larger part of it.

right across the mouth of the river at the light-house pier-head. Should this occur to any great extent, immediate relief by dredging must be afforded, or else the incoming western fleet in the spring will have to come to behind the outer breakwater, and lighter before entering the river. Should they come in such a body, all at once, as they did a few years ago, the anchorage would not accommodate them, and the state of affairs, bad enough at any rate, would be positively disastrous, and inflict a blow upon the reputation of Buffalo as a commercial point from which it might not recover for years.

But the worst of the whole matter is that the present appropriation by the General Government is nearly exhausted, and what little balance remains on hand is tied up by outstanding liabilities. Moreover, no further sum appropriated by Congress can become available until July 1, 1874, unless so especially enacted, and by that date all the mischief would have been done. * * * *

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

F. HARWOOD,

Major of Engineers, U. S. A., in charge of Buffalo Harbor Improvement.

Hon. L. P. DAYTON, Mayor of Buffalo.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New York yields to me a moment. I desire simply to make a statement why this does not come from the War Department. The estimates of the War Department are made up at the end of the fiscal year. This new danger came last December, and, of course, could not come in the report the War Department made to us at the first of the session. As this is only to meet a present exigency, I hope there may be no delay.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I should like to ask my colleague one question—whether this letter is not from the United States engineer in charge of the work?

Mr. BASS. The communication read is an official communication from the major of United States engineers, stationed at Buffalo under order of the War Department, having special supervision and charge of the work there.

Mr. WOODFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BASS. I do.

Mr. PARSONS. Wait a single moment until I make a suggestion.

Mr. WOODFORD. I will give way to the gentleman from Ohio in a moment.

This is a matter, Mr. Speaker, not local, but in which every part of this country has an equal interest. It touches the West, with its grain, and New York and Brooklyn, with their commerce, just as much as it touches the city of Buffalo, with its forwarding interests. If you would keep freights on your railroads down to just and reasonable rates, you must afford all possible facilities to your canal and water communications. These furnish the only sure competition against the railways. At Buffalo and Oswego the enormous fleets of the West concenter going to New York. Over the Erie Canal and its branches the grain of the West must be moved in the spring. This bar at the mouth of Buffalo Harbor should be swept away, and the money to do this be provided now or it will be too late to do the work when the spring opens. In the name of the great Northwest, for the sake of the farmer, the forwarder, and the merchants of my own home by the sea we ask to-day that the House be wise, and just, and prompt in its action.

There is sure precedent for this appropriation and its instant passage. When there have been sudden calls for men or money in the interest of war, to preserve national honor and redress national insult, money has always been voted promptly and justly. When lately a vessel was seized by a foreign cruiser upon the Gulf, the Secretary of the Navy did but his duty in placing our fleet in readiness without waiting for an appropriation, and this House at once responded to the call, approved the patriotic action, and voted the necessary money.

Sudden calamity has befallen the harbor of Buffalo. The injury is not local; it affects alike the producer and the consumer. Close but one of our avenues of transportation, and that but for a time, and the hurt will be felt alike by those who labor on the far prairies of the West and those who toil in factories and warehouses on the Atlantic coast. We but ask, in the interest of the great industries of peace, that prompt and wise liberality which you have so often given for the expenditures of war. You have voted millions for the soldier and the sailor. Promptly vote these few thousands for the farmer, the forwarder, the merchant, and the workingman. We want this harbor of Buffalo put at once in a condition where it will be able to do its share of the forwarding business in the spring. For the Northwest and for New York alike we ask the House at once to consent to the passage of this bill.

Mr. PARSONS. I entirely agree with my friend from New York, and I do not think there is a single gentleman on the Committee on Commerce who does not entirely agree with him also. I know my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does. I ask in order to expedite this matter the gentleman from New York will allow by unanimous consent this matter to be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which committee meets to-morrow morning, with permission to report back to-morrow to the House. There will be no objection to that I think, and in that way the whole matter may be arranged.

Mr. BASS. I should like to say I have exhibited the map to the various members of the Committee on Commerce to whom I could gain access, it being a case of great emergency, and so far as I know they all recognize the importance of making this appropriation. I submit, therefore, with this state of facts uncontroverted, many of them being within my own personal knowledge, and proper inquiries having been made at the War Department, it seems to me the time of the House need not be absorbed, a majority of the Committee on Commerce having assented to the proposition already, and I ask the House to pass this bill under a suspension of the rules. I ask for an immediate vote. I know it is not in the interest of Buffalo alone, but in the interest of the farmers of the West, and the producers, whose corn and wheat are to an unprecedented extent stored in the warehouses of Chicago, Milwaukee, and other ports upon the shores of the lakes; and I ask in their interest that this House to-day, doing what is demanded by this unprecedented condition of affairs, shall simply anticipate an appropriation which Congress has always made for this harbor. I ask that the House shall pass this bill, and give to these men in the West, as well as to the men in the East, the right to pass this commerce through Buffalo without imposing on it a tax of five or ten cents a bushel, which you will impose if you deny this relief upon this occasion. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the House, I trust under this state of facts without a dissenting voice, will pass this bill for this petty little bagatelle for the relief of commerce, which, if not passed, will levy upon probably ten million bushels of grain which will reach that port, within three weeks of the opening of navigation, a tax of five or ten cents a bushel, that will amount to fifty times the appropriation we now ask you simply to anticipate.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make one suggestion. I desire to inquire if the gentleman from New York has ascertained whether there is not a contingency fund out of which the War Department can make the repair without passing a special deficiency bill now. The value of the suggestion of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. PARSONS] would be this: If the bill should be referred to the Committee on Commerce, they can ascertain to-morrow whether there is now a fund that the Chief of Engineers has a right to employ for this purpose, and when that is ascertained, as it can be to-morrow, then, if this deficiency appropriation is necessary, the Committee on Commerce, with leave to report at any time, which we ought to give them if we refer the bill to them, can bring it before the House in due course and in proper order. The letter read from the desk is a slip cut from a newspaper; and I call the attention of the House to the fact that it is not the most regular way to pass a deficiency bill, on a slip cut from a newspaper.

Mr. BASS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] a member of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPEER. I object to further debate.

Mr. BASS. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is acquainted with the locality; and, from his long service in this House and on the Committee on Commerce, is familiar with this question. I ask that he be permitted, being entirely impartial with reference to any local interest, to make a statement of facts within his own knowledge.

Mr. SPEER. It will only delay the matter a day to send it to the Committee on Commerce. I object to further debate.

The question was on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and being taken, there were—ayes 121, noes 26.

So the motion was seconded.

The rules were then suspended (two-thirds voting therefor) and the bill (H. R. No. 1905) was passed.

ENROLLMENT OF STATUTES.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Enrolled Bills be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law that requires the statutes of the United States to be enrolled on parchment, and to devise some method by which the text of the laws may be better preserved from interpolations and changes, and that the Committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

REPORT OF COLONEL WILLIAM E. MERRILL.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the use of Congress, the report of Colonel William E. Merrill on the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio River.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following preamble and resolution be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides in express terms that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; and whereas this provision of the Constitution imposes upon Congress powers and duties of such high moment to the common commercial interests of the people of these States, as the citizens of one nation, as to have been a leading cause for the formation of the Union itself: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That, in the judgment of this House, it is within the constitutional power of Congress by law so to regulate commerce among these States as to protect that portion of our internal commerce which is among the several States from all unjust or oppressive tolls, taxations, obstructions, or other burdens, whether imposed by railroad companies or by combinations thereof, or by other common carriers, when engaged as the instruments of such portion of the commerce of the people; that the present condition and magnitude of the commerce among the States are such as to demand the prompt and wise exercise of the power and duty declared in this resolution.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, it was declared by the Chair, on the vote by sound, that the ayes had it.

Mr. COX. I ask for further count.

The SPEAKER. Further count being demanded, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. SMITH, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 51.

So the motion was seconded.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move to amend the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It would not, under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Pending the call of the roll, the Chair will entertain the requests of some gentlemen for unanimous consent to introduce bills for reference.

HENRY B. HAVENS.

Mr. BARBER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1907) granting a pension to Henry B. Havens, private of Company K, Twelfth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REUBEN GOODRICH.

Mr. HUBBELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1908) for the relief of Reuben Goodrich; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. McCORMICK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1909) granting the right of way to railroad companies in the Territories of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT CHALMETTE, LOUISIANA.

Mr. SHELDON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1910) donating six cannon to be used in the erection of a monument in the national cemetery of Chalmette, Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TEST OATH FOR CREDITORS.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1911) repealing the joint resolution approved March 2, 1867, prohibiting payments by any officer of the Government, to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MORRILL S. BEAN.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1912) granting a pension to Morrill S. Bean; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, presented papers in the contested-election case of C. Y. Thomas against A. M. Davis, from the fifth congressional district of Virginia; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

CUBAN INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of 4,162 citizens of New York City, praying for belligerent rights to Cuba, and in aid of those who are struggling for independence and the abolition of slavery in that island; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UTAH AFFAIRS.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of citizens of Utah, memorializing Congress for legislation to protect the people of that Territory in their rights; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT FOR MAKING HAT-BODIES.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, presented the remonstrance of 2,300 hatters, citizens of the sixth district of New Jersey, against the renewal of the patent for making hat-bodies issued to Henry A. Wells January 26, 1846; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES B. SMITH.

Mr. WILBER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1913) for the relief of Charles B. Smith, deceased, late first lieutenant Fifth Iowa Cavalry, United States Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AUGUSTUS SPRAGUE.

Mr. FIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1914) for the relief of Augustus Sprague, late a private Company B, Second Michigan Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC., IN CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to give notice that since the adoption of the recent rule in regard to the Official Reporters of debates making a notice of petitions presented, slips giving notice to the reporters of the presentation of such petitions are unnecessary. The reporters have made arrangements to have them all recorded, and all that is needed is that the gentleman presenting a petition shall put his name on the back together with the committee to which he desires it referred.

Mr. MYERS. But if members desire to furnish the reporters with that matter, there is no objection, I presume?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; there is no objection.

Mr. MYERS. It may be more satisfactory to themselves and to their constituents.

IMPROVEMENT OF FRENCH BROAD RIVER.

Mr. THORNBURGH, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of 300 citizens of Jefferson County, Tennessee, asking for certain improvements in the French Broad River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish to this House a statement of all moneys expended by the Government upon each of the public works for the construction of light-houses and the improvement of rivers, and harbors, and canals, from 1779 to 1873, inclusive, and so added to the partial statement of public expenditures heretofore furnished to the Senate in such form that the entire statement may appear together arranged in proper form.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That ought to go to the Committee on Commerce; it will make an enormous document.

Mr. CONGER. The work is almost completed in the report to the Senate. There are certain additional things that the Committee on Commerce would desire to have for their information.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does this resolution come from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. CONGER. It comes from me, in behalf of the committee. It is not the action of the committee.

No objection being made, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

APPROPRIATIONS UNDER INDIAN CONTRACTS.

Mr. SYPHER, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That before any money shall be appropriated or payments made, on account of contracts made with the Government for Indian supplies for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, the Committee on Appropriations shall first make a thorough examination into all the circumstances connected with the letting of said contracts, and whether the awards were made to the lowest bidders and in all other respects conformed to the statutes governing the same, and that the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses.

AMENDMENT OF THE HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to have a special order made for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1760) reported as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 1388) amendatory of the homestead law, by the Committee on the Public Lands, and now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I ask that it be made a special order for Wednesday a week from next Wednesday, being the 18th instant, from the hour of half-past one o'clock, to the exclusion of all other orders on that day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to exclude the appropriation bills.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This bill will not occupy long, I am sure.

Mr. GARFIELD. We will endeavor to keep out of the gentleman's way if we can, but we want to reserve the right to occupy that day if necessary; and if the gentleman will make that exception I will make no objection to his proposition.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman agree to that exception?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there be no objection, the bill will be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for Wednesday, February 18, to the exclusion of all other orders, excepting reports from the Committee on Appropriations.

No objection was made.

ABSENCE OF UNITED STATES CONSULS.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to inform the House of the names, if any, of the consuls of the United States who may have been absent from their posts since January 1, 1873; how often and by what authority they have been absent; and whether during such absence they are entitled to or received pay.

Mr. LOWNDES. I object.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask, then, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

There was no objection, and the reference was made.

APPROPRIATIONS UNDER INDIAN CONTRACTS.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There was a resolution passed just now, on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SYPHER,] which I desire to move to reconsider in order that a correction may be made. His resolution reads thus:

Resolved, That before any moneys shall be appropriated or payment made on account of contracts made by the Government for Indian supplies for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, &c., the Committee on Appropriations shall first make a thorough examination into all the circumstances connected with the letting of said contracts, &c.

Now the resolution, as it reads in that form, does not apply to the next year for which the Committee on Appropriations is to appropriate, but it provides that nobody shall be paid under any contract now existing until such investigation has been made, and it would therefore entirely stop the wheels of the Government so far as that Department is concerned. If the gentleman will amend the resolution by making it refer to the years 1874 and 1875, as he probably intended to do, why then there will be less objection.

Mr. SYPHER. I am willing to include the year 1875 with the years 1873 and 1874, but my purpose is to have an investigation made of all contracts now existing, before payment shall be made for services yet to be rendered.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I would ask the gentleman, has a single branch of Congress the power to order that the Government shall stop payments under contracts already made?

Mr. SYPHER. I do not construe the resolution as stopping any payment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It would clearly stop everything during the present fiscal year.

Mr. SYPHER. The payments are made quarterly, and I imagine that before the end of the next quarter the Committee on Appropriations will have performed this duty.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will enter the motion to reconsider, and will call it up when the gentleman shall have had time to consider the matter more fully, unless, indeed, he will agree to refer it to the Committee on Indian Affairs or to the Committee on Appropriations. I would say, however, that the Committee on Appropriations do not want any more labor devolved upon them.

Mr. SYPHER. I am very much astonished, Mr. Speaker, to hear the gentleman from Maine make such an admission before the House, that the Committee on Appropriations are not willing to incur any labor that may be necessary to protect the Government in all its interests. I think, sir, we ought to put upon them all the labor necessary for that purpose belonging to their duties, and let them do this work, and do it promptly.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Is this discussion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Then I object.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I enter the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and will call it up at some future time.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides in express terms that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; and whereas this provision of the Constitution imposes upon Congress powers and duties of such high moment to the common commercial interests of the people of these States, as the citizens of one nation, as to have been a leading cause for the formation of the Union itself: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That, in the judgment of this House, it is within the constitutional power of Congress by law so to regulate commerce among these States as to protect that portion of our internal commerce which is among the several States from all unjust or oppressive tolls, taxations, obstructions, or other burdens, whether imposed by railroad companies or by combinations thereof, or by other common carriers, when engaged as the instruments of such portion of the commerce of the people; that the present condition and magnitude of the commerce among these States are such as to demand the prompt and wise exercise of the power and duty declared in the preceding resolution.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is it in order to move to refer that resolution to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the House has seconded the motion for a suspension of the rules, and the House must vote on it.

Mr. SPEER. Cannot the preamble be separated from the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Not under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. SPEER. It declares an historical fact for which I am not prepared to vote.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 73.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and on a division there were—ayes 34, noes 128.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was again taken; and there were—yeas 61, nays 165, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Crittenden, Alexander M. So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague, Mr. COOK, is too unwell to attend the session of the House to-day.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. My colleague, Mr. KELLOGG, is absent on account of sickness in his family. If here he would vote "no" on this question.

The question again recurred upon the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution submitted by him, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to call for a separate vote on these propositions?

The SPEAKER. It would not, as the motion is to suspend the rules, including the one which gives a member the right to call for separate votes on independent substantive propositions.

Mr. BIERY. Is it in order to move to refer this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Nothing is now in order but to vote on the motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 171, nays 64, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Bland, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. So (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. G. F. HOAR said: I desire to state that Mr. CROCKER, my colleague, is absent on account of a destructive fire affecting his property.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was communicated to the House by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of the East Tennessee University.

GREENBACK CURRENCY.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That if any increase of currency should be directed by Congress, the same ought to be of United States notes, commonly called greenbacks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was on the same subject as the one just now voted upon. The rights of the gentleman will be preserved; but the Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who wishes to bring before the House business of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe the motion to suspend the rules is a privileged one to-day.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the reason I claim preference for this resolution over other business.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the Chair entertaining the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RANDALL. I will not object if it causes no delay.

LEGISLATION IN APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. KASSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall be in order for the Committee on Appropriations to report with the appropriation bills for consideration such amendments to existing laws related to such appropriations as shall tend in their judgment to retrenchment and economy in public expenditures.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. As this resolution appears to give rise to objection the Chair will first entertain the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

GREENBACK CURRENCY.

The resolution of Mr. RANDALL was read, as follows:

Resolved, That if any increase of currency should be directed by Congress, the same ought to be of United States notes, commonly called greenbacks.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules to adopt the resolution just read.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were ayes 104, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays. This is practically a test vote on my resolution.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 22, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. COX were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 43, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I hope the motion to adjourn may be withdrawn. Let us come to a direct vote on the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SPEER. That is right.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 92, nays 117, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Arthur, Averill, Barrere, Bell, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burchard, Cannon, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Dobbins, Donnan, Durham, Eames, Foster, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, George F. Hoar, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Kasson, Lamar, Lawrence, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McJunkin, Merriam, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Negley, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Pendleton, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Ransier, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Henry B. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the petition of Robert Gower, and many other citizens of the State of Iowa, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to issue $300,000,000 in legal-tender Treasury notes, or so much thereof as may be needed, and offer them in exchange for any outstanding matured or unmatured bonds at their cash value; said Treasury notes to be convertible into bonds bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 4 per cent. per annum, on demand of the holder, and these bonds made payable, with interest thereupon, in legal-tender Treasury notes on call of the holder; $100,000,000 of that to be of the denomination of $50, $100,000,000 of the denomination of $100, and the remainder of the denomination of $500, confidently believing, as they do, that this measure will offer relief to our present financial difficulty, and greatly facilitate the liquidation of our national debt. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLANAGAN presented a petition of citizens of Texas, asking an additional appropriation for the improvement of the Cypress Bayou and Lake Caddo leading from Northern Texas into Red River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOGY. I present a concurrent resolution passed, by the Legislature of Missouri, remonstrating against the unfair and illegal discrimination in rates charged by the Union Pacific Railroad. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed. I prefer that it should be referred to that committee because a bill introduced by the Senator from Kansas on this subject has been referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. BOGY. I also present at the same time, as a part of the same subject, a memorial from the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, and a letter addressed to myself on this subject; and move that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed. They are important as a matter of information.

I will state that this subject has been before Congress for more than two years. The Union Pacific Railroad Company is charged with imposing unfair and illegal charges, contrary to the acts of Congress by which a large subsidy was given to the road; and although this important subject has been presented to Congress for more than two years, there has been no action whatever taken on the matter. The thing has just died out for want of action on the part of the committee to whom the subject was referred. It is a matter of very great importance to my section of the country, as well as to the State of Kansas; and I hope that the Committee on the Judiciary will take this subject up and give the acts of Congress a construction. The Union Pacific Railroad claim that they have a right to charge the rates they are now charging. The Kansas Pacific Railroad deny that they have any such right. I have examined the subject with some care, and to my mind it is very plain; but, nevertheless, is a legal question, arising alone on the construction of the acts giving to these railroads the subsidies which they have received, and I can only express the hope that the Committee on the Judiciary will at an early day take this subject up and make a thorough report, so as to settle this controversy, which has existed for more than two years in the western country. I move that these papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. RAMSEY presented resolutions adopted at a regular meeting of the Ramsey County Medical Society, held at Saint Paul, Minnesota, January 26, 1874, in favor of the passage of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER presented a memorial of citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, asking to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a brief petition from the students of the Storer Normal School at Harper's Ferry, in which they humbly pray that such laws shall be enacted as will secure to them and their race all the rights and privileges of American citizens. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of a large number of merchants of New Bedford, Massachusetts, in which they set forth the evils of an irredeemable currency, and beg leave to represent most earnestly that a resumption of specie payments at the earliest practicable time is imperatively required by the true interests of the nation, and they deprecate the issue of any more legal-tender notes. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a petition of citizens of Shutesbury, Massachusetts, in which they set forth that they were soldiers in the late war of the rebellion; and they ask, in justice and in equity, that the bounty to which they are entitled may be made equal to that of others. In short, they ask for a special committee to investigate the workings of existing laws as to this question, and that said committee be empowered to report such amendments by bill as may be found just and practicable. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY presented additional papers in the case of Ben Alsop, in support of his claim for a pension for services as a soldier in the war of 1812, as a substitute for his father, Bob Alsop, of King George County, Virginia; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WEST. I present the memorial of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, asking that an adequate appropriation be made for the purpose of reopening the New Orleans mint, and for such legislation as will empower the Government of the United States, at its discretion, to order the coinage of any bullion, &c., at the New Orleans mint. I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a memorial of certain surgeons of the United States Navy, asking the passage of a law to restore certain officers of the Medical Corps of the Army to their proper rank in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GORDON presented a memorial of manufacturers of hats in Georgia, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MERRIMON presented five petitions of citizens of North Carolina, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Statesville to Yadkinville, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ALCORN presented the memorial of William Cameron, a citizen of Mississippi, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALCORN. I also present the memorial of Sallie A. E. Baley, administratrix, and S. P. Baley, acting administrator, &c., of Richard Griffith, deceased, of Mississippi, and move its reference, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Claims.

I desire to call the attention of the committee specially to this case as one of very great hardship, in this: Richard Griffith was the marshal of the Government of the United States for the district of Mississippi at the time the war began; that he went forward in the discharge of his duties and expended a large amount of money on behalf of the Government; that he died during the war and before his accounts were settled; that the Government now owes his estate a large claim for services rendered by him and for money expended by him; and for one reason and another he has been up to this time, and his estate has been, refused all remuneration on the part of the Government. He has left a widow, and orphan children to educate who are penniless, the Government owing them a large amount of money; and I do trust that the committee will report upon the facts as set forth in the memorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Captain E. Carrington Bowers, of the Navy, praying to be promoted to the rank of commodore on the retired list; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of Seth Padelford, president of the National Bank of North America, in Providence, and of numerous other presidents and cashiers of national banks, remonstrating against the bill to withdraw from the national banks that were first organized under the act twenty-five millions of circulating notes, for the purpose of distributing the same in those parts of the country which did not organize their proportion of the national banks. The memorialists represent that besides its injustice, the disturbing influence of this measure would work an injury, not only to the sections immediately affected, but to the general industry of the country, far greater than any benefit that could be expected to the sections proposed to be benefited thereby.

As several Senators have referred to the disproportionate amount of national-bank currency in the State of Rhode Island, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes while I make some statements in regard to the reasons why that amount was assigned to this State and why it ought not to be taken away.

There is a theory that banking capital should be distributed by the square mile; that not trade, mechanical and manufacturing production, and the other conditions that require the employment of money as the medium of exchange, but territory, should govern the distribution of incorporated capital. Texas is as large as two hundred and fifty Rhode Islands, therefore Texas should have two hundred and fifty times as much banking capital as Rhode Island. Hardly less absurd, and even more prevalent, is the theory that banking capital should be distributed according to population, per capita; that a community of a hundred thousand farmers requires the same amount of bank facilities as a community of a hundred thousand traders, merchants, and manufacturers. That the circulation of banks, wherever situated, will flow to the money centers, to the creditor points, is as plain as that water will seek the lower level; and as water, if confined to a higher level, will break away through all obstructions, and follow the descending channel, so will money, equally, and by a law of not less force than the law of gravitation, flow to the points where it is wanted to perform its proper function—to pay debts. Everybody knows this; and yet there are those who argue, or whose argument reduced to its analysis is, that money can be made plentiful in a debtor section by establishing banks there, and that by legal means and artificial restraints it can be kept in circulation within geographical limits.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent has been the subject of especial animadversion, because we have found it necessary to employ a larger banking capital than some States that greatly exceed us in territory and in population, and which, according to the theory that I have referred to, should have a correspondingly greater amount of banking capital. The Senator from Missouri who sits on the opposite side of the Chamber dwelt with great emphasis upon the fact that the small State of Rhode Island had so much more banking capital than the great State of Missouri. If we go into some other comparisons between the two States we should find a similar disparity; and following the comparisons still further, we should find that in some other respects, even taking into consideration the difference in territory and in population, Missouri surpasses Rhode Island as much as Rhode Island surpasses Missouri in banking capital.

Previous to the national-bank law, and up to the time when, persuasion having failed, the Federal Government compelled the State banks to come under the national system or to give up their circulation, each State had all the banking facilities that it needed and that it could command. What was then the proportion of Rhode Island to Missouri? Did it correspond to the territorial dimensions of the two States? Did it correspond to the population of the two States? Missouri is fifty times as large as Rhode Island and has eight times the population, and yet she had but little more than half the bank capital. Missouri had forty-two banks with an aggregate capital of $11,249,990, and Rhode Island had ninety banks with an aggregate capital of $21,794,937. Although the smallest of the States in territory, and the smallest but five in population, there were but five States in the Union that surpassed Rhode Island in incorporated banking capital, and one of the five surpassed it by only a few hundred thousand dollars. The banking capital of the great State of Pennsylvania exceeded that of Rhode Island by less than $5,000,000, and that of the great State of Ohio was not a third as large. And New York, the great commercial State of the Union, whose territory is forty times as great as ours and whose population is twenty times as great, had but five times our banking capital. Rhode Island had more banking capital than Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and all the Northwestern States together.

This was the normal condition. We had this disproportionate banking capital—disproportionate to our territory and to our population—because we wanted it; and the other States had so little because they did not want it. We had it because, under inhospitable skies and upon an ungrateful soil, compelled to manufacturing and mechanical and commercial pursuits, we found it for our advantage to invest so much in banking; they, with a virgin soil that hardly needed the labor of cultivation, with vast natural resources that begged for development, found it more profitable to invest their own savings and to borrow of ours for employments that would yield a better return. It may be said that in some States the legislation, in some even the fundamental law, disfavored banking. That is only another way of stating the proposition that I have already laid down. If the laws discouraged banking, the people made them; the restraint was their own work, and could be removed at their own pleasure. The banking capital of every State conformed to the internal conditions of the community, and free from any external control or restraint.

When the national-bank system was inaugurated, it was proper that it should conform to the established and natural condition of things, to the relations into which they had settled down of themselves, uninfluenced by outside considerations. Whatever capital and experience had found proper under the existing system should have been permitted to pass under the new one. No violent changes should have been made, no disturbance of capital, taking it from the centers that had proved their need of it by investing in it, and carrying it to points which had manifested their indifference to it by failing to invest in it.

It was deemed essential to the public interest, to the credit of the Government, to its financial security, that the capital incorporated under State laws should be brought into the national system. Pressing invitations were made and liberal inducements were held out. The banks, cautious, contented with their present condition, fearful of change, did not respond with the promptness that the necessities of the Government demanded. More stringent measures were adopted; the banks were threatened with a taxation that would destroy their circulation, without which they would cease to be profitable, or could be made so only by imposing such rates of interest as would oppress their customers and embarrass the trade which they were intended to foster.

The late Mr. Collamer, with the quaint humor in which he sometimes conveyed the lessons of wisdom, illustrated, in a speech in this Chamber, the process of converting the State banks into national banks. It had been said, on the other side, that the banks were not to be driven into the national system by the bill that was under consideration, and that afterward became a law; they were to be enticed into it. "Yes," he said, "enticed into it, as one of my neighbors said that he had enticed a vicious bull out of his pasture. 'How could you entice it out?' was the question. 'O, with a pitchfork,' he answered."

I am not speaking against the national-bank system. The system which gives us a currency of uniform value all over the country, and of absolute safety; a currency that holds its credit even after the bank that issued it has failed, and which at the same time is a muniment to the national credit, is undoubtedly one of the most successful and beneficial financial measures that the wit of man has devised, and will always remain the praise of the statesman who planned it. In the security which it gives, in the freedom from all doubt or question of the medium of exchange, we are apt to forget its value, as we do the value of good health, good air, good water, which we fully appreciate only when we miss them.

But the banks were slow to go into the system. With the characteristic timidity of wealth they hesitated to leave a satisfactory system for an untried one, however promising. In Rhode Island, especially, we were content with our banking system. It was the growth of our own needs. The capital belonged to our own people, and gave life to our own business; it was regulated by our own laws, which, in some important respects, were peculiar. We did not like to pass that large accumulation under laws that we did not make and could not alter. We did not like to put without our control so great an amount of our property and facilities so essential for our business. But we did it; we yielded to the enticement; with few exceptions our banks became national institutions. And now we are told that a large part of the advantages which aided to overcome our reluctance, and without which we would not have accepted the change, must be surrendered to those who steadily refused to go into the national system till its success was assured, who refused to intrust their property to the legislation of the national Government at a time when the Government was in its greatest need. These banks now ask to share the benefits of a plan in which they declined to share the risk.

Mr. President, this is not fair; it is not keeping good faith with those who changed their investments, voluntarily or by compulsion, on the pledge which the Government made in asking it, and which the Government repeated in compelling it.

I well understand that the true remedy for the inequalities, real or alleged, of our system, the remedy for evils greater than this, is the return to that measure of value which the world recognizes; and then we can have a paper currency of the same value, because convertible into the same form, and self-regulating and elastic to the demands of trade. But while we retain our peculiar currency, we should maintain the faith on which it was issued to those who rendered their capital for it.

I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into a discussion of the question started by the Senator from Rhode Island as to whether currency, like water, will seek its level, but the presentation of these petitions and the remarks that the Senator from Rhode Island has made prompt me to call attention to what I think is a result of this inequality of distribution that certainly demands attention, and demands remedy, let the question of circulation finding its level be determined as it may when we come to legislate upon that question. What I call attention to is this: Immediately after the establishment of the national banking system, very great complaint was made that the stockholders in those banks received 5 or 6 per cent. interest upon the bonds which were the basis of their circulation, and were exempt from State taxation, although permitted to make their money by the discount of paper in the States. As a consequence of this complaint, Congress passed a law permitting the State Legislatures to tax the stock in national banks to the same extent that the States taxed other property of the same description. What was the result? Taxes were imposed which, according to the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, amounted in many instances to 2 per cent. of State tax on the bonds of the United States. In the report of 1871 or 1872, I do not now exactly remember which, the whole tax, both national and State, is reported to be 4½ per cent. The result is, as any one will see, that by this law of Congress and the subsequent legislation of the States the States were permitted to do indirectly what it had been before decided that the Constitution of the United States prohibited them from doing; that was, in effect, taxing the bonds and securities of the United States. It is true that the tax was not laid on the bonds per se, but it was laid on the capital stock, which was in effect the bonds, for in the early bank-tax cases, the New York cases, it was decided that the State could not lay a tax upon the bank stock, which was, in effect, the bonds of the United States.

Now, then, the inequality to which I call attention is this: I do not exactly remember the excess which Rhode Island has of this national-bank circulation, but the whole excess of the New England States is about $80,000,000, of which Rhode Island has a very considerable proportion. The effect of all this is that about 2 per cent. of the interest paid by the United States upon the bonds which are the basis of that banking capital goes into the State treasuries as so much State tax; in other words, the United States is paying into the treasuries of those States which have this excess of national-bank circulation that much of the interest upon their bonds, and the States which did not get their share of it suffer that much disadvantage. This is an inequality which, whatever may be said about the theory of the distribution of money per capita, or per population, or by wealth, needs a remedy, and I have no doubt will secure it without doing very much injury to any portion of the country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Before the Senator from Pennsylvania sits down I should like to put a question to him in relation to this mode of taxation. I cannot agree to the statement that the States lost anything in taxation by virtue of the establishment of these banks. The amount of capital that would be required to put into the national banks of course is now taxed in those States, and if the holders take it out and put it into these banks it does not change the result. Of course any State that establishes a bank must have the capital. If it has not been invested in a bank, it is already taxed by the State, and it does not change the result by being put into a national bank.

Mr. SCOTT. My friend from Vermont, in the earnestness of his opposition, has forgotten the question which he said he wished to ask me before I took my seat.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the question if that is not so?

Mr. SCOTT. The difference is this: In the case of the capital held by a citizen of Vermont, or any one of the New England States, when it is taxed, he pays the tax himself out of his own earnings; and in this case by an indirect process the Government of the United States pays that 2 per cent. in the form of interest, which gets finally in the form of taxation into the State treasury.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This matter touches New England, and as I in part represent a State which is in that locality, I desire to say one word upon this question of inequality. So far as allusion is made to the question of inequality existing between the banking circulation or the banking capital of New England and the rest of the Union, as a matter of complaint, I simply desire to say that there is no occasion for any complaint whatever. It may be that it is the good fortune of New England to have that banking capital. New England, as has already been stated, did not think so in the beginning; but it has it. It has it by legitimate means; it has it by legal means; it has it by no option of its own; but under circumstances which have been related by the Senator from Rhode Island, when it was for the interest of the nation that it should have it and when no other part of the country would take it.

I say, then, Mr. President, it does not become anybody from any quarter to make this charge against New England as a matter of complaint. What New England has was open to all the rest of the country to have had if they chose to take it. It may be that it was their misfortune that they could not take it. My honorable friend on my left [Mr. CLAYTON] suggests that the South were in no condition to take it. That is very true. But whose fault was that? Not ours. Whose misfortune was that? Not ours. All I stand here now to say is, not on the question of distribution, but as resisting this idea of complaint, as if somebody had a right to complain, that New England had done something that was disreputable, or if not disreputable, that was a little sharp in regard to the distribution of this bank currency. It was not so by any means; but, as my honorable friend from Rhode Island has said, they were enticed into this business by rather a sharp practice, as they thought at the time, on the part of the General Government, which forced them to yield their local system, which was satisfactory to them, and to go into the national system.

I only rose to say this much to vindicate New England against any complaint from any quarter or any charge against her for the fact that she has this capital; and I do not intend to touch at all upon the other question, what it is proper to do under the circumstances by way of equalizing the distribution of currency.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire, by way of suggestion, to state this proposition, not that there is any complaint—I have never heard any in the Western States—against New England because New England had capital, or because they took the national banking currency at the time they did; but I have heard a great deal of complaint because we have not been permitted to do the same thing. That is all. We want it so extended that we may.

Mr. ANTHONY. You were permitted to do it when we did.

Mr. LOGAN. We should like to be permitted to do it now. I speak from my own experience and knowledge in my State when I say, that when a State has to pay 2½ per cent. in order to get circulation for her banks that are in existence there is cause of complaint; and we have been compelled to do that in the Northwest. We have had to pay even higher than that. I can mention one of the large banks of the city of Chicago that had to pay 2½ per cent. for circulation because of the rule that we are not entitled under the law to circulation except under a certain amount. If that is not a hardship, I should like to know what is; and if that is not a cause of complaint, I should like to know what is.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, Mr. President, I would merely call the attention of the Senator to one thing. What bank circulation did Illinois have before the national banking system was established, when it could have all it wanted, when there was no restraint, when it made its own banking laws and supplied its own banking capital? How much banking capital did it have then? A million and a half.

Mr. HAMLIN and Mr. LOGAN rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me a word.

Mr. HAMLIN. I got up to stop this debate.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to its being stopped, but I would rather it should not be stopped just at this point, because I desire to answer my friend from Rhode Island, who speaks of the banking capital that Illinois had fourteen years ago. He says it had a million and a half of dollars then. I only call the attention of my friend from Rhode Island to the statistics of the State of Illinois for the last fourteen years—to the increase in population and wealth. We may have been poor at that time, but we are not so now. Give us the opportunity, and we will show you whether we have capital in that country or not.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to call his attention to one fact, which is a notable compensation that is lost sight of in this discussion?

Mr. HAMLIN. Am I not entitled to the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor, having yielded to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, I will yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island, in order that he might reply to the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is correct.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I was satisfied, however, that the good nature of the Senator from Maine would always yield to me.

I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois, who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and did valiant service in the field, to this fact, which may have been lost sight of, that while it was the misfortune of the West not to possess the capital which the East held, yet that did not retard its efforts in doing its large share in the suppression of the rebellion. In that great struggle, where capital was needed to be invested in bonds to supply means to support the Army, it was indispensable to have men to fill the ranks. The West did not lag behind New England, but stood in the front in supplying more than her quota of rank and file, so that what she had she generously proffered to the Government.

While the Senators representing New England may, in speaking, affirm their excess of capital, I do not complain of their availing themselves of the benefits assured by that surplus of capital; but at the same time I wish them to be as considerate and remember that though the East may have furnished more money, the West furnished a greater proportion and more than its quota of men. I may speak, in illustration, of my own State when I say that she furnished 12 per cent. of her population in that exigency of the nation. Now, I ask Senators representing the New England States if their States did better or as well, and whether sacrifice of life will not offset capital invested. The West is filling up its thinned ranks, and now, gathering means, asks in justice for more circulation, and for no more than the quota of New England.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of inviting the attention of the Senate to the condition in which we are now placed. This whole debate, I believe, from its inception by my excellent friend from Rhode Island to this minute, is out of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir; I beg pardon; my remarks were entirely in order.

Mr. HAMLIN. And I am now speaking out of order myself, except by unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator is aware that I was not speaking out of order, because I spoke on a motion to refer a memorial to a committee, which is a debatable motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think I have a single word or letter to change in the expression which I used, that this debate is out of order; that upon the reference of a petition you only state the facts in it, and it goes to a committee without debate. All the currency question and all the questions of establishing banks, I humbly submit again, are not in order; but I do not know that we shall any of us live to see the time when it will be in order to speak in order, for it seems that the only method of proceeding in this Senate is to be out of order. I hope that these questions will pass away for the present, and that we shall proceed with the business of the Senate. That was my object in rising, and I ask now for the regular order of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I believe this debate is on a motion to refer a memorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial has been referred some time. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. Then I should like to say a word out of order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state his understanding, that this debate proceeds, as it has ever since the present occupant has been in the Senate Chamber, whenever any Senator chose to have such a debate proceed, by unanimous consent. The Chair, therefore, raised no point of order. The Senator from Maine, however, now raises the point of order, and the Chair rules that further debate is out of order.

Mr. CAMERON. Is it in order now to make a report from a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further petitions or memorials, reports are now in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of George S. Hollister, late a captain of the Seventh Regiment United States Infantry, asking for the establishment of a court of inquiry with a view to his restoration to the Army, with the rank and grade held by him prior to the passage of the act of July 15, 1870, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Foreign Relations has had referred to it a bill (S. No. 175) relating to leaves of absence granted to diplomatic and consular officers of the United States. It was designed to extend the leave of absence which might be granted for a given year, and was not taken advantage of, into a subsequent year. The matter has been referred to the Secretary of State, and in his reply is this laguage:

> The enactment of the proposed bill would, I am convinced, seriously affect the public service by giving a seeming legislative sanction to a claim of right to a certain annual absence from the post of duty of each diplomatic and consular officer of the Government; it would embarrass the exercise of the discretion of the President; and it would add very largely to the appropriations required for the diplomatic and consular service.

Under that view, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report the bill back with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 476) to establish bonded warehouses for the storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama, praying compensation for raising, repairing, and delivering the steamer Saint Patrick, at the navy-yard, Pensacola, Florida, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 465) for the relief of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of C. B. Dean, of Springvale, Iowa, praying for a pension from May, 1864, to 1872, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 409) to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes in relation to estimates, appropriations, and public accounts, reported it with amendments.

REPORT ON IRRIGATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, transmitting a paper prepared by Hon. G. P. Marsh, on the subject of irrigation; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. ALLISON offered the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand extra copies of the report of Hon. George P. Marsh to the Commissioner of Agriculture, on the subject of irrigation, be printed for the use of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of John Montgomery be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Captain Samuel B. Lauffer, and that he be authorized to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Michael Nash be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, it was Ordered, That Timothy Baker have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 466) to remove the disabilities of Raphael Semmes, of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 467) to provide for the opening of a military and post road from the mouth of Walnut River, in Kansas, to the mouth of the Main Cache River, in Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JONES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 468) authorizing the coinage of a twenty-cent piece of silver at the mints of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 469) granting aid to the Atlantic and Great Western Canal; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY OFFICER IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate the information called for by the following resolution, which passed the Senate on the 1st day of March, 1873:

"Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, requested to inform the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, whether any commissioned officer of the United States Army, while on duty in the State of South Carolina, has received, or attempted to procure, payment of any money or other valuable consideration from the Legislature of said State, or endeavored to procure legislation to that effect, as a compensation or reward to him for services performed in the line of his duty as an officer of the Army or otherwise; and whether any such officer, while so stationed and on duty, has been admitted to practice at the bar of said State, and has actually practiced thereat for his personal emolument, while receiving pay as an officer of the Army; and whether such officer is now on duty in said State, and, if detached from his regiment, for any and what service or purpose."

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that, as I understand the first part of his resolution, it proposes to require this information absolutely.

Mr. BAYARD. A resolution of inquiry was adopted in March last, and I presume it has been an omission on the part of the Executive to furnish the information requested in it; and this resolution simply calls now for the information which the Senate asked for then.

Mr. WRIGHT. The suggestion that I have to make is that the resolution as originally passed requested the information, "if not inconsistent with the public interest." I understand the resolution, as now framed, to call for it absolutely.

Mr. BAYARD. The resolution now is for a response to the resolution of March last. The resolution of March last was for information if it was compatible with the public interest, and that condition, of course, would apply at the present time to the present resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to have the first part of the resolution reported again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate the information called for by the following resolution, which passed the Senate on the 1st day of March, 1873.

Mr. WRIGHT. That will do. I understand that the resolution, as now read, calls absolutely for this information.

Mr. BAYARD. It calls upon the President to inform the Senate why the information asked for then was not given; his reasons therefor, if there be any reasons why it is not compatible with the public interest; and what they are would be very difficult to imagine. But if there are reasons why this information should not be given to the public the President can say so, and the present resolution simply asks that he may inform the Senate and give this information if it be not incompatible with the public interest. The resolution, as now worded, simply calls for an answer to the resolution, and the resolution of March last was expressed sub conditione that it should not be inconsistent with the public interest.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not understand the resolution so; but if the Senator insists upon it I do not know that I shall object.

Mr. HOWE. Let the resolution be read again.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am satisfied that my first impression was right in reference to that resolution, and I ask that it may lie over and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa objects to the further consideration of the resolution to-day.

MANUFACTURE OF SILVER COIN.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to state what time will be required after the resumption of specie payments for the mints to manufacture the amount of subsidiary silver coins which will be requisite to replace the fractional currency.

DR. EDWARD JARVIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis, the consideration of which was resumed by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1906) to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of the Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of December, 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 1915) to remove the political disabilities of Henry H. Sibley, a citizen of Fredericksburgh, Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1920) to amend the fifteenth section of an act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 1921) to further amend the postal code.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 194) in relation to the monument erected to the memory of the Chevalier de Ternay; and it was thereupon signed by the President of the Senate pro tempore.

SETTLERS ON FORT RANDALL RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section authorizes the Secretary of War to transfer to the custody of the Department of the Interior such portions of the military reservation of Fort Randall, in Dakota, as were actually occupied by settlers prior to the promulgation of the order of the President of June 14, 1860, setting apart the reservation for military purposes; and, further, such portions of the reservation as were released from military occupation and control between the years 1867 and 1870, and were during that time settled upon in good faith and in the belief that the lands were open to settlement.

The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to confirm, in accordance with existing laws, the titles of such settlers upon the military reservation of Fort Randall as may be reported by the Secretary of War for that purpose, and to cause patents to be issued for such lands as the settlers may be entitled to under existing laws and the provisions of the act.

The third section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to each of the aforesaid settlers the respective amounts that were appraised as the value of their respective improvements, by a military board of survey convened for that purpose, at Fort Randall, under instructions from the War Department dated March 3, 1871.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to add to the third section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That in case any improvements, or portion thereof, shall have been restored or delivered to any settler, after the appraisement of the same by the said military board of survey, such settler shall not be entitled to payment under this act for the improvements, or portion thereof, so restored or delivered to him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to hear the report read, if there is one in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. KELLY on the 15th of January, 1874:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 149) for the, relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

Prior to the year 1860 certain persons settled upon public lands which were in that year included within the Fort Randall military reservation, and made improvements upon their respective claims. These lands were taken up in good faith, and under the impression that titles could legally be secured to them under the land laws of the United States. Upon the reservation being made, the settlers were removed by the military authorities from their land claims, and had to abandon such improvements as they had made, and which could not readily be taken away. On the 7th day of September, 1867, a portion of the reservation was abandoned by the military authorities, under the belief that it was lawful for the War Department to abandon and transfer to the Interior Department for settlement such military lands as were no longer required for military purposes. Discovering that this could not legally be done, the War Department resumed jurisdiction over this portion of the reservation which it had attempted to relinquish. This was on the 1st day of November, 1870. In the mean time, between the 7th day of September, 1867, and the 1st day of November, 1870, a number of settlers went upon the lands which were supposed to have been abandoned, and made improvements upon their respective claims. After the military authorities resumed possession and jurisdiction over this abandoned portion of the military reservation in 1870 the settlers were removed and their improvements taken. A military board of survey convened at Fort Randall, under instructions from the War Department, dated March 3, 1871, for the purpose of appraising these improvements, proceeded in the discharge of its duty, and made a thorough investigation of all claims for damages resulting from the military occupation of the respective land claims of the settlers. A report of this military board of survey will be found in Ex. Doc. No. 32, House of Representatives, Forty-second Congress, third session. The lands referred to are no longer necessary for military purposes; but, having been selected for a military reservation, it requires an act of Congress to have them transferred to the control of the Department of the Interior. Inasmuch as the persons who settled upon these lands did so in good faith, it is but just that they should be paid for the improvements which they made upon their respective land claims, and of which they were deprived without any fault of their own. The committee have reported an amendment to section 3 of the Senate bill, providing that, in case any settler shall have received back any portion of the property taken from him by the military authorities, after the appraisement thereof by the board of survey, he shall not in such case receive payment for the same.

With this amendment the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that this was a military reservation, and that the attention of the people was called to it in 1860; that in 1867 the Secretary of War again assumed control over it; and that during 1860 and 1867 settlers came there and made improvements, which this bill calls upon us to pay for. I confess that I do not see the justice of our paying for improvements which were made by settlers on a military reservation after it was known to be a reservation.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow the report to be read again, so that he will understand it more thoroughly, I think he will be satisfied.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is House bill No. 792.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no desire to press this bill now; but I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that if he will read the report carefully, he will find that he is mistaken. These settlers settled on the land at a time when it was not used for a military reservation; and afterwards, when it was taken for a military reservation, the Secretary of War valued their property. Now the bill is to give them the value of their property, and provide that those who want the land may take it by paying for it to the Government, this portion of the reservation being no longer desired. I ask the Senator to examine the bill, and he will see that it is perfectly proper.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will examine it.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the bankrupt bill, the Chair will state, in regard to the vacancy on the joint select committee on the memorial of W. W. Corcoran and others, created by the Senate excusing the Senator from Maine, Mr. MORRILL, from service, that he appoints the Senator from Iowa, Mr. ALLISON; so that the committee now, under the rules of the Senate, will stand: The Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. BOUTWELL; the Senator from Ohio, Mr. THURMAN; and the Senator from Iowa, Mr. ALLISON.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MERRIMON, to insert as section 2 of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary the following words:

The courts of record of the several States having superior jurisdiction and jury trials shall have like judisdiction of all matters of bankruptcy arising under the laws of the United States, and shall have power in all respects to administer such laws. And all orders, judgments, and decrees of such State courts made and passed in that behalf shall be deemed and held to be of the same force and effect, to all intents and purposes, as if the same had been made in the courts of the United States having jurisdiction of such matters: Provided nevertheless, Any party to any matter or suit in bankruptcy in any such State court shall have the same right of appeal, or other method, to remove such matter or suit to the highest court of review in such State as may be allowed by the laws thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There was an amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] yesterday in reference to giving jurisdiction to the State courts for sums under $500. In the phraseology there was some error, and I now offer a substitute, which is agreeable to the Senator from North Carolina and to the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By unanimous consent the substitution can be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be regarded as reconsidered, and the Senator from New Jersey proposes to make the amendment read as will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the court having charge of the estate of any bankrupt may direct that any of the legal assets or debts of the bankrupt, as contradistinguished from equitable demands, shall, when such debt does not exceed $500, be collected in the courts of the State where such bankrupt resides, having jurisdiction of claims of such character, nature, and amount.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended, as a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment as a separate section:

That the fourteenth section of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out "1864" in lines 27 and 28, after the word "year," and inserting "1872."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like that to be explained. Let us know what it is.

Mr. SARGENT. I will explain it. By section 14 of the act of 1867 it is provided that as soon as the assignee is qualified, the register, in case there is no adverse or opposing interest, and if there is, the judge, shall execute an assignment to him of all the debtor's property. The section then proceeds to make certain exceptions, which are not to be subject to distribution, which are not to go to the assignee; and the final clause of exception provides for property which "is exempted from levy and sale upon execution or other process or order of any court by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864." This bankrupt law was passed in 1867. By a very wise provision it was provided that the limit of exemption prevailing in 1864 should be applied rather than any amount which might be prevailing at the time of the passage of the act, I suppose under the idea that some States might pass improvident laws on the subject of exemption in view of the bankrupt law. I preserve that feature in the amendment which I propose, carrying back the time of exemption to 1872; and thus this danger will be avoided.

But the object of the amendment is to allow in those States where the exemption laws may have been to a certain extent liberalized down to as late a date as 1872, the debtors to have the benefit of the exemptions then provided. The bankrupt law and the State laws for the collection of debts, the laws which are intended to enable the creditor to collect the amounts due him, always necessarily bear hardly upon debtors. The influential class in all State Legislatures, and in this body, is the creditor class. They are the ones who have a right of attachment, who have a right of suit, a right to secure their demands, and exemptions grow up slowly. The debtor for long years had no exemption whatever. Before that he was liable even to personal restraint for mere debt. Finally a humane policy, to a certain extent in his behalf, began to permeate the laws; it was provided at first that mere wearing apparel might be exempted; subsequently a man's home valued at a moderate amount might be preserved to him or his family, and not be taken for his debts. Now, by the policy of the law in some of the Western States, and in my own State, in behalf of farmers during the last eight or ten years, there have been certain agricultural implements or machines which before that time were subject to execution exempted; and there has been a very useful little machine, called the sewing-machine, which has also been exempted from execution by many of our States.

Now, I propose that the amount of the debtor's property, which was exempted by statute from seizure or sale in 1872, instead of the amount which was exempted in 1864, shall be the amount which will be exempted by the amendments to this bill. It is very little mercy which is extended to the debtor class. It is certainly in the way of humanity, and I can see no just reason why, now that we are amending the law and are endeavoring to make it in some of its features, as is contended by the able chairman of the Judiciary Committee, merciful to the debtor, we do not adopt such modifications of the exemption laws as were made, not in view of this bill or in view of our action, but were made two years ago, and which may be beneficial in these particulars.

It is a very serious question in the minds of many Senators, it is certainly in mine, whether it is not better to repeal the bankrupt law entirely. I have been disposed, however, to assist the committee in modifying it in the particulars in which they have proposed that it be modified, and I therefore have, I believe, on every division voted for the amendments of the committee. I desire that the bill may be so liberalized, if that is the proper word, as to introduce such features that, while it may be effective to secure the rights of creditors, it may bear with the least hardship on debtors. I am disposed, if the bill can be put in form, to vote for amendments, instead of an entire repeal. It seems to me that the proposition that I now present can work no harm; there can be no valid objection to it; and I trust it will have the assent of the committee and be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from California is mistaken in supposing that the expression "1864," as regulating the exemptions in the first act of 1867, now exists in the law. By one, and I believe by two, amendments, extending that time, it has been run up from 1864 to 1871 already, so that my friend's amendment in fact only changes it for a year.

The grounds upon which these two amendments—for I am sure there were two—were made were very plain. In 1866 (because it was practically 1866 when the act was passed) some of the States had not been reorganized, and so they would have no exemption at all, because the act referring back to 1864, when several of them had no constitutions to which we could refer anything, and no laws passed under the constitutions, would be left out entirely, and therefore there would be a great inequality and want of uniformity in the bankrupt law, greater, indeed, even than this is as it now stands, which, as my friend knows, is open to very great question on constitutional grounds. But finally, by two amendments, this exemption under State laws in each State, respectively, was brought down to 1871. We were persuaded to vote for that upon the ground that that would fix a uniform exemption throughout the United States, not to change with the varying laws of the States as they might change them, but to take an existing condition of things at that date, as we did first in 1867, and then again in 1869 when all the States had got their new constitutions and their new laws in operation, and then laying down the rule that would operate at that time, which would fix, as was thought by many, a standard which would fall within the Constitution of the United States, requiring uniformity of the system throughout the United States.

My friend, of course, is not ignorant of the fact that when the bankrupt act of 1867 passed, it was the subject of great debate and of great doubt whether it was constitutional then to fix a specific and arbitrary limitation of this kind referable to the laws of the various States as they then existed; and that same thing occurred in 1871 again. But we stood in 1871 exactly on the same principle that we did in 1867; that is to say, we took the pre-existing constitutions and laws of the States that had got rehabilitated, and said "Now we can fix it at this date, which will operate everywhere within the United States, and will cover the case of every State, and will only be subject to the doubt that existed in 1867."

It was suggested that we should make this exemption movable, so to speak, that it should vary with the changes in the State laws; but everybody, I believe, agreed that we could not do that; that that would be plainly against the constitutional provision requiring a uniformity of system and of rule. So it was thought the most we could do would be to fix this inflexible rule on a given day, which, although it applied differently in different States, yet applied uniformly to an existing condition of State law which should be continued. Now to take the step that my friend from California suggests, I think he will readily see, would open a still wider field of doubt that might put us in trouble. I hope he will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I frankly confess that I was not aware of the amendment bringing the exemption down to 1871. As there is only a difference of one year between that and my proposition, I will not differ with the committee upon that point, and will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I offer the following amendment. In section 3 of the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, line 5, after the word "expense," I propose to insert:

And all notices of sales made by an assignee shall be published in a newspaper having the largest circulation in the county or city in which the sale is to be made.

I understood the chairman of the committee to say that he would accept this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, I am not authorized to accept the amendment. When the Senator from Virginia spoke to me about it the other day in another case, as I understood, in a different part of the bill—but I do not know that that would make any difference in the principle—I said that as far as I was concerned, on the spur of the moment, I did not see any special objection to it. But on consultation with some of the other gentlemen it appears to us that the best thing for a bankrupt's estate is to leave that question entirely with the judge, who by law is authorized to direct in what papers the notice shall be given, because it would often happen, as has been suggested to me by reflection and by what has been said on the subject, that a newspaper having a smaller circulation would be more likely to give notice to the particular class of persons who were to be affected. For instance, in the case of the sale of a piece of real estate under the amendment now proposed by my friend from Virginia, it might happen that a newspaper having a small general circulation in its county, if you please, would not be so good for the purpose of giving notice of the sale of that piece of real estate as a newspaper having a large circulation in the particular town where the real estate lay, and in which the buyers of it would be expected to be found.

If the judge, in his discretion, should think that the paper having the largest circulation in the county, if he has any earthly way of finding it out, would be the best, then he would so order, unless you go on the assumption that the judge would violate his duty. If, on the other hand, the judge should think it best in a particular case that a newspaper which, no matter how small the general circulation of the paper was, went into the hands of the people affected, should publish the notice, he would so order. For instance, as to a notice to creditors to attend, one class of newspapers might go into the hands of people affected, having a small general circulation, when newspapers of the largest circulation in the State or district, or wherever it might be, would have very little circulation among that class. It is impossible to find out the circulation in these cases—as we know how newspapers are managed—unless you have a distinct provision of that kind, which shall be amply and carefully drawn on that precise point.

Suppose the judge, under this amendment, makes a mistake in his opinion as to what paper has the largest circulation, the result would be that the whole proceeding would be upset; it would be a jurisdictional question; the sale would be invalidated; the purchaser would have to give up perhaps after fifteen or twenty years' time. Therefore I suggest to my friend, although there is great force in his views—and as he stated them to me in the first instance he almost took me captive, as he generally does when he makes a proposition—I think on reflection he will see that on the whole the safety of the estate is better cared for in leaving this question with the judge to determine what paper shall be employed and what shall not; and I am sure you could scarcely imagine that a judge would purposely go wrong in such a case. Of course it might happen in a particular instance that there might be political favoritism, and yet I should be very sorry to suppose that more than 1 per cent. of the judges in the United States would be influenced by any such consideration in giving small advertisements, which might amount to ten or twenty dollars, to a newspaper on account of the fact that that newspaper happened to be democratic and he was a democratic judge, or it happened to be republican and he was a republican judge.

I think, therefore, on reflection, as I believe the gentlemen do with whom I have spoken on the subject, that the best course is to leave this matter, as it is now, in the discretion of the judge.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The object of the amendment was to correct an evil in the practice now. The law provides now that certain sorts of judicial notices shall be published in certain designated newspapers in each State. Under that law, in the State of Virginia, for instance, I think there are but four papers designated for the publication of notices of this sort. To illustrate how badly that practice works, take the district in which I live, in which the town of Abingdon is situated; and the paper in which all notices of sales are printed is published in the city of Lynchburgh, one hundred and eighty-nine miles away; a paper that has no circulation anywhere in the western part of the State. It has no general circulation anywhere, and yet the judge considers himself bound by law to require all these official notices of sales to be published in that paper. The consequence is that it gives no notice whatever to the people. It affords an opportunity for assignees and their rings to have the sales when and where they please, and conducted as they please. The object of the amendment is to prevent that state of things, and to so provide that all sales shall be made at the place best calculated to give public notice of the sale. The judge in this particular case does not do this out of favoritism, but he considers himself bound by law to have the notices published in that paper, and he will still do so unless this amendment or something like it be adopted. I have seen many bankrupt sales where there were but four or five persons present, generally composed of the assignee and the assignee's own ring, nobody knowing anything of it except those the assignee had told privately, the public having no notice whatever of the sale, and the property has gone into the hands of persons at a nominal price and the creditors get nothing. It is to correct that state of things that I desire this amendment adopted.

Mr. THURMAN. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is in section 3, line 5, after the word "expense" to insert, "and all notices of sales made by an assignee shall be published in a newspaper having the largest circulation in the county or city in which the sale is to be made."

Mr. ANTHONY. How is it proposed to ascertain that fact?

Mr. SARGENT. The one designated by the judge as having the largest circulation.

Mr. ANTHONY. How is the judge to ascertain the fact?

Mr. SARGENT. That is matter of discretion. He can designate the paper having the largest circulation.

Mr. THURMAN. We had a law, if I am not mistaken, in Ohio, of this kind; I do not think it was in regard to sheriffs' sales, but in regard to the publication of the auditors' accounts, I think, of receipts and disbursements of the county funds. My impression is that it was in reference to some such thing as that. I also think we had at one time—I may be mistaken about it; the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads perhaps can tell—such a provision in the laws of the United States in reference to advertising the list of uncalled-for letters, that it should be published in the paper having the largest circulation; and I remember very well that the practice under that, or such a practice, grew up, whether it was required by law or not, for the publishers of newspapers to submit affidavits as to the circulation of their newspapers to the officer who had the decision to make as to which paper had the largest circulation. I remember that at one time most of the publishers of papers in the city of Cincinnati sent in their affidavits to the postmaster, if I am not mistaken, claiming, each one of them of those who had sent in affidavits, the right to publish the list of uncalled-for letters; and that has been done several times. I do not know, speaking for myself alone, but that the principle of this amendment is right; but, if it should be adopted, it would require some guard to be thrown around it, and this guard would certainly be necessary, that the decision of the court, if the court was to make the decision as to which paper had the largest circulation, should be final and conclusive; otherwise the difficulty might arise suggested by the Senator from Vermont, that the proceedings might be invalidated by the fact that the publication had not been made in the paper having the largest circulation.

I do not know whether this amendment is of much importance or not. I think it is right in principle, but it must be very carefully prepared in order to accomplish the very end which is aimed at, that is to ascertain what paper has the greatest circulation, and also to guard against the consequences of a mistake in case the advertisement should be made in a paper which, in point of fact, had not the largest circulation. If the amendment could be put in some shape that would guard against these evils I do not know, speaking for myself alone, but that I might vote for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In order to get around the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the committee, I propose to offer the amendment again, with a slight change which I will make in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. While the Senator is preparing that, I move to fill the blank in the composition section, which was the old section 10, but now must be section 13 or 14, on page 14, line 17. I move to insert in the first blank, which relates to the consent of creditors to a composition which takes the case out of court practically and bars the right of the creditors, according to an agreement which they may make with the bankrupt, and gives him time to compose the affair—to insert in the first blank which relates to the number of the creditors the words "two-thirds," and in the other blank the words "one-half;" so that it will read that this first resolution for a composition "shall be confirmed by the signatures thereto of the debtor, and two-thirds in number and one-half in value of all the creditors of the debtor."

I believe that this is substantially in accordance with the English act of composition, though I think this second resolution or instrument, which I am now referring to, in the English law requires only a half of each; but as we have made the earlier part of the composition a little more favorable to the creditors than the English law did in some respects, I think it right, as this discharges a debt due to a man against his consent by a proposition to give time instead of winding up the estate, that it should take a little greater number of people to consent to it than is provided for in the English law under the other circumstances. I therefore move, without consultation, however, with the committee, to insert the words "two-thirds" in number and "one-half" in value in the composition section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Now I move to fill the blank on page 9, line 53, with the words "1st day of December."

Mr. MORTON. "Eighteen hundred and seventy-three."

Mr. THURMAN. That is already in, as the Senator will find on the next line. This amendment raises an important question to which Senators should give their attention. The sentence in which that blank occurs declares:

> And the provisions of this section shall apply to all cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy commenced since the ——, 1873, as well as to those commenced hereafter. And in all cases commenced since ——, 1873, &c.

Of course the second blank will be filled by the same date as the first; and therefore I only move now in relation to the first. This section, which amends the original section 39 in the bankrupt act, is, as the Senate must have observed, the most important section in this whole bill, and this sentence proposes to make the section retroactive; but how far it shall retroact, the committee have left to the Senate to decide, without any suggestion whatever, by reporting it with a blank. Now, I propose that it shall retroact to the first day of the present session of Congress, which was the 1st day of December; and I do not think it ought to retroact further than that. Retroactive laws can scarcely ever be defended. They are unjust in principle. A retroactive law affects acts, contracts, and doings of individuals in one state of the law by changing the law ex post facto—not ex post facto in the strict legal sense, for that relates to criminal laws alone, but by retrospective or retroactive legislation, and that can scarcely ever be defended.

In this particular case, however, I think this section, being remedial in its nature, and all persons seeking to put others into bankruptcy having had notice from the very first day of this session that the bankrupt law would either be repealed or essentially modified, it is not doing them injustice to make this section retroact to the first day of the present session. I put it distinctly upon that ground. The President, in his message, recommended the repeal of the involuntary clause. It is true that that message was not received and read on the first day, but it was received and read on the second day of the session, and on the very first day of the session, if I am not mistaken, bill after bill was introduced to repeal the involuntary part of the bankrupt law, and I think it was distinctly understood over the country that the law would either be repealed or most essentially modified. The Senator from Indiana on my left, [Mr. MORTON,] took occasion to offer a resolution, before Congress took its holiday recess, the very object of which, as he declared at the time, was to notify everybody that if men commenced proceedings in bankruptcy, they did it subject to having their proceedings affected by such legislation as Congress might adopt at this session. With all that notice to creditors who have put people into bankruptcy since the 1st day of December, I think there is no injustice in making this section, which affects the remedies, which is a remedial law, apply to their cases; but I do not think it would be just to make it retroact still further back and affect proceedings that have taken place in the several bankrupt courts of the country under the law as the people then understood it to be, and which they then had no solid reason to think would be changed.

There is a difference of opinion among the members of the Judiciary Committee as to the date that should be inserted in this blank. Some think that the section ought to retroact to the beginning of the panic. That is not my opinion. For the reason that I have already stated, I do not think it ought to retroact beyond the first day of the present session of Congress; and therefore I have made the motion to fill the blank with the 1st day of December.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the argument of the Senator from Ohio require that the blank shall be filled with the day that we took the recess, for certainly it was not until that time that the country had any positive reason to suppose that the bankrupt law was to be modified?

Mr. THURMAN. My friend is mistaken. He will recollect that the President's message, which we should in the ordinary course of proceeding have received on the first day of the session, but which by mere accident we did not receive until the second—an accident which the President was not to blame for—distinctly advised the repeal of the involuntary part of the bankrupt law. But before that message was received, if I am not mistaken, in each House of Congress bills were introduced for the repeal of that part of the bankrupt law, and before the recess took place the House bill had passed in the other wing of the Capitol.

Mr. MORTON. I will state to the Senator that I introduced a bill which provided that the law should take effect from and after the 1st of December, the first day of the session.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a question for information merely. I understand that by this bill it is necessary that there should be one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the creditors to commence bankruptcy proceedings. Suppose that proceedings have been instituted under the law as it stood, as it stands now, and sales have been made. I forget whether there is any provision made in reference to these proceedings. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the effect that this retroaction may have upon rights which have become vested before the alteration is made.

I remember there is a provision in the act giving, I think, ten days in order to perfect the number, to get one-fourth of the creditors in number and one-third in value. It is suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that the sale would stand, and if the proceedings were set aside, the proceeds of the sale would go to the debtor.

Mr. MORTON. Is there not a provision to recover back where the money has been paid?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There could have been in that time no money paid to the creditors by way of division. No case has gone so far as to get a dividend yet in this retroactive part, and so far as there was a dividend it would stand, because rights had been acquired, and it would be right. Each creditor would get so much on his debt, which would go in diminution of the debtor's liability; and of course in dropping the proceeding at a particular time and dismissing it, so far as it had gone, supposing a sale had been had by an assignee or receiver in the mean time, it is perfectly clear, on general principles of law, that every right acquired down to the time when the court was acting under the law would be perfectly valid. Therefore, if a person had purchased a stock of goods or real estate pending these proceedings, being valid at this moment, the proper number of creditors having petitioned, that is to say, one who had a proper case, and the debtor having been adjudged a bankrupt, if now we repeal the statute in whole, or say those proceedings shall proceed no further except upon certain conditions which are not complied with, every right that has accrued by purchase or payment in either case or by sale would stand just as it would have stood if the law had gone on. It only says that you shall proceed no further in these past cases or in any future one unless you have the concurrence of a certain proportion of the creditors. If that concurrence is not obtained, then the proceeding is dismissed, but valid up to that time. There is no difficulty, I am sure, on that particular point. Of course if the money of the debtor had been paid out to the creditors on dividend he ought not to have a right to recover it back, because it has paid so much of his debts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. As a matter of course, the same amendment should be made in line 56. The same date should be inserted in the blank there. That amendment may as well be agreed to by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that amendment will be made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

SEC—. That in all cases of involuntary bankruptcy now pending, or to be hereafter pending, against any person, whether an adjudication in bankruptcy shall have been had or not, the person adjudged or alleged to be a bankrupt may prefer his petition to the district court in which such proceedings are pending, praying to be allowed to make an assignment of his property, real and personal, to a trustee to be appointed by the court, for the benefit of his creditors. He shall file in connection with his petition a list of the names of his creditors, with the places of their residence, and the amount due to each so far as he can determine the same, verified by oath or affirmation; and notice of such petition shall be given to the creditors of such petitioner by publication in one or more newspapers designated by the court, requiring them to be and appear before the said court at a time named in the said notice, to show cause, if any they have, why the prayer of the petitioner should not be granted. If at the time specified none of said creditors shall appear and show cause, as required, the court shall make an order for the assignment according to the prayer of the petitioner, and therein name the time in which such assignment shall be made, and the manner of its execution, and the person to be assignee. Such assignee shall have all the powers and authority over the property named in the assignment which under existing laws are conferred upon assignees of bankrupts, and shall dispose of the same upon such terms and in such manner as the court shall direct, and shall make return of his proceedings from time to time to the court, as may be required by order of said court. The assignee shall distribute and pay over the proceeds of the assets assigned to him to the creditors according to the legal right to the same under existing law. Upon the execution and delivery of the assignment, as aforesaid, the petitioner shall be discharged by the court, and such discharge shall have the same force and effect as a discharge in bankruptcy under existing law.

Mr. President, I have offered this amendment simply to give to the bankrupt some rights independent of the consent of his creditors. I am aware that under section 43 of the law of 1867, if the creditors consider it their duty to have the estate wound up, a certain proportion—I believe three-fourths—may compel an assignment upon application to the court by them, for the purpose of winding up the assets of the estate of the bankrupt; and under an amendment which has been offered by the Judiciary Committee, a majority of the creditors, by the consent of the bankrupt, may enter into a composition and settle the claims in that way; but the bankrupt himself has no right independent of the action of his creditors.

Now, it seems to me that an amendment such as I have offered will secure to the bankrupt what it is perfectly right and fair that he should have. After he has been thrown into bankruptcy by the petition of a certain number of his creditors, my amendment simply comes in and allows him to make an absolute assignment of his assets, and thereupon become discharged, making an assignment to such assignee as the court may designate; and that assignee has all the power, under the amendment I have offered, over the assets of the bankrupt, that assignees in bankruptcy have under the existing law. My object is simply to enable the party, without the consent of his creditors, by the surrender of his whole estate, to be discharged—to be discharged, without any consent from any person, upon the fair surrender of all his assets and an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. Under the provision that has been reported by the Judiciary Committee he may make a composition with his creditors; but it requires the vote of one-half the creditors to do that. I propose that a debtor, after he has been placed in bankruptcy, may make an assignment under the direction of the court, and thereupon become absolutely discharged. That is the purport of the amendment I have offered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That interferes with the whole scheme of bankruptcy that has ever been considered in any country, and goes a length in respect to debtors such as would encourage every fraudulent debtor to contrive to get himself forced into bankruptcy, and to cheat his creditors by the act, and to get his discharge in spite of them. The committee has gone quite as far, they all think, as it is safe to go in the direction of aiding the debtor; further, as many of them think, than it is safe to go; but of course we must harmonize opinions on these doubtful points. I do not think I need occupy the time of the Senate in asking them not to overthrow the whole principle of the bill upon this proposition of my friend from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware to the committee's amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following amendment:

That section 21 of said act be amended by inserting the following words in line 6, immediately after the word "thereby:"

But a creditor proving his debt or claim shall not be held to have waived his right of action or suit against the bankrupt where a discharge has been refused or the proceedings have been determined without a discharge.

The amendment explains itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where do you have it come in?

Mr. SUMNER. Immediately after the word "thereby," in the sixth line of section 21. It qualifies the first proposition of the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should have said that that was the law now, but my friend has shown me a decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts, which seems to hold that a creditor proving his debt is absolutely cut off from suing the debtor after bankruptcy, even if the debtor is not discharged; and of course if any court so holds, this amendment is a proper one.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which is to strike out the House bill and substitute the sections already agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest, as was suggested once before, that the first part of the new print or substitute of the committee should be made to read as my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggested:

That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, is hereby amended and supplemented, as follows.

That is suggested by my friend from Ohio, and I think it very wise. I presume there is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that change will be made. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as just amended.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to strike out the "1st of December" and insert the "1st of November" as the time when this retroactive provision of the act shall take effect. The objections to retroactive laws, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, are all true; but we are passing this law at a peculiar period, just after a great panic, in which a great many people suffered from the involuntary part of this law; and it seems to me that it would be better to extend the benefit of this modification back as far as the 1st of November. I do not wish to discuss the subject, but to take the sense of the Senate upon it.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to hear some reason why we should go back to the 1st of November. If we go upon the ground of relieving everybody who got embarrassed in the panic, you would have to go back to the 1st of October, instead of the 1st of November. The panic was at its height as early as the 1st of October; the Senator from Indiana on my left [Mr. MORTON] says the 15th of September. So that fixing the 1st of November would be simply arbitrary; it would rest upon no principle that I can conceive of. But I must insist that retroactive laws are so obnoxious to principle and to sound policy that we ought not to go back any further than we have agreed to do, that is to say, the 1st day of December, when the whole country was notified that this law would be repealed or substantially modified. The people had no such notice on the 1st of November, or any time in November. No man knew, unless he were in the secret councils of the President, that any such recommendation as that contained in the President's message would be made. Nobody knew that it would be so speedily and heartily responded to by either House of Congress. And, therefore, it is unfair, as it seems to me, to put this back one single day beyond the commencement of the present session of Congress. I hope the Senate will stand by what it has done, and not strike out December.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What the Senator from Ohio states, I think, is correct, that in order to afford all the relief that we can give, this bill should go back to the 15th of September. The provision of the Constitution is that we shall have a uniform bankrupt law. It is true that means geographically uniform, but it is also true that it ought to be uniform in reference to all debtors. Now if a proceeding was commenced on the 20th of November, the parties to it do not get the benefit of this modification. If it was commenced on the 1st day of December, without any difference in the merits of these different creditors, they do get the benefit of this relief that we are affording. But there is also truth in the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio as to the disadvantage and objection to retroactive laws, and, therefore, as a compromise between those different interests, I suggested the 1st of November.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected—ayes 9, noes not counted.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

SEC. —. All notices of sales under this act by any assignee or officer of the court shall be published in a newspaper to be designated by the judge as having in his opinion the largest circulation in the county or city in which the sale is to be made.

This is the substance of the amendment that I offered before, modified so as to meet the objection made by the chairman of the committee.

So far as I know, the objections to the bankrupt law are not against the law itself, but against the administration of it; and nothing has been a more fruitful source of complaint than the mode in which sales have been made by assignees and the officers of the court. The judge of the district in which I live, Judge Rives, is a man of the strictest integrity, and yet he considers it his duty to advertise all judicial sales in the whole district in one single paper. That paper is published at Lynchburgh, and from that point to the extreme western point of the district is two hundred and seventy-five miles. Many of the people there do not know that there is such a paper in existence, and the publication of judicial sales in that paper is nothing but a farce. There are but very few cases in which they reach the eye of anybody interested in a sale.

Everybody must admit that all these sales should be made in a manner best calculated to give the public fair notice of the sale. The only object I have is to effect that purpose. Let the judge designate when a sale is to be made, ascertaining in the best mode he can the paper best calculated to give notice of the sale in whatever county it may take place, and direct that the sale shall be advertised in that particular paper; and in that way, and in that way only, according to my belief, can we secure fair notice of these public sales.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator's amendment read as the last part of his observation was heard, there would be very little objection to it. The remarks of the Senator are to the effect that the judge should cause the advertisement to be made in that paper best calculated in his opinion to give proper notice to the people interested in the particular sale. That would be merely stating that under the present law the judge should do his duty. But what the amendment says is that the judge shall not have that discretion which he has now by law, and which, if he is fair and just, he ought to exercise in every case; but it says that he shall be bound by the iron rule of the greatest circulation.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is not the language now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The greatest circulation in the vicinity; I believe that is it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That word is not used. The language is "the paper best calculated to give notice."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me hear the amendment read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK read as follows:

All notices of sales under this act by any assignee or officer of the court shall be published in a newspaper to be designated by the judge as having in his opinion the largest circulation in the county or city in which the sale is to be made.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will correct that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought the Senator's speech and his amendment did not go very well together.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will modify the amendment so as to make it read:

All notices of sales under this act by any assignee or officer of the court shall be published in a newspaper to be designated by the judge as being in his opinion best calculated to give general notice of the sale.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Virginia whether he means that this one designation shall be a standing designation for all sales, or only from time to time?

Mr. JOHNSTON. From time to time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Speaking for myself alone, I am entirely willing to accommodate any gentlemen's views where it does not essentially change the law, although this is plainly the law now; and if the Senator would make his amendment read, "That all notices of sales under this act, by any assignee or officer of the court, shall be published in that newspaper or newspapers"—because sometimes in vast estates notice ought to be published in several papers—"to be designated by the judge which in his opinion shall be best calculated to give such notice of the sale," I should not make any objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I agree to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I do not object to it in the form in which I have suggested the modification. I think it is what the judge ought to do now, and therefore I do not care to discuss the matter with my friend from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the proposed modification, and the question is on the amendment to the amendment as modified.

The amendment to the amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, the discussion to which we have listened in the Senate for the past week upon the amendments to the bankrupt law, proposed by the Judiciary Committee in lieu of the House bill providing for its repeal, has been signalized by marked ability and learning. The zeal with which this report has been maintained and defended by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] having special charge of it, abundantly attests the thorough and thoughtful consideration which the entire bankrupt system has received and undergone by the committee in their investigation of this difficult subject. Some of these amendments, it must be frankly acknowledged, are salutary improvements upon the existing law, and to a certain extent may remove some of the salient objections which have justly rendered it so odious and oppressive. Others should have been adopted, which failed to meet the approval of the Senate, that in my judgment would have been wholesome restrictions in the right direction. Unable to concur with the committee in the expediency or necessity of retaining this law, but yet earnestly desiring, if it was to continue, it should be as far as possible stripped of its objectionable features, I have deemed it proper not to embarrass the action of the friends of the measure by proposing any amendments myself, but preferred to allow the bill to be matured before stating my objections to it. That having been now accomplished, I desire to state briefly the reasons which constrain me to vote for the House bill.

I have always doubted the policy of any national bankrupt laws. I have never been their advocate. The experience of England, whence our bankrupt system, as well as that of our own country, unmistakably indicates the extreme difficulty of devising any bankrupt law which shall, in its operation, be attended with useful or beneficent results. An inherent infirmity seems to pervade the system itself. This, I think, is abundantly proved by the difficulty which has invariably attended the practical execution of this species of legislation, both in England and in the United States. Abuses, frauds, and perjury, which no legislative foresight, however wise, and no public polity, however enlightened, have been able to prevent, have invariably marked their operation. In every country where they exist they have been signal failures. Nor do I know that so sad an experience is greatly to be wondered at. Any legislation having for its object the release of debtors without the consent of their creditors, would seem, by any just standard, to be directly opposed to the duty and end for which all governments have ever been founded. Upon every sound maxim of morals, the logical sequence of all such laws must directly tend to impair commercial credit and lower the standard of individual responsibility.

Human nature in its weakness is the same everywhere. No legislative cancelment of contracts, without the consent of creditors, can ever be accomplished without becoming a strong temptation to heedlessness in the creation of debt and a certain correspondence in any self-denying exertion for its prompt liquidation. Establish such a permanent system of bankruptcy and the major part of the debtor class will by degrees learn to place their hope of relief in contrivances to obtain legal discharges from their obligations rather than in any constant personal exertion to provide means for its payment. Of course there are many highly honorable exceptions to every general rule. But all enlightened legislation demands that the representative should look to the greatest good of the greatest number. I am now commenting on the practical operation of a permanent bankrupt system, which several Senators during this debate have advocated as a national blessing. To it I always have been and still am inexorably opposed. I will not say that in great monetary revulsions or at periods of sudden and vast national distress a well-guarded bankrupt law, limited to a brief period, might not be productive of good. No such necessity, as I shall presently show, exists now. The history of English and American jurisprudence alike proves most incontestably that bankrupt laws have in the past proved signal failures, and their practical operation has been attended by great and unmeasured abuses.

The Congress of the United States, Mr. President, have in modern times wandered far, very far, from the theory of bankrupt law as understood and administered for more than three centuries in England. There bankrupt enactments were understood, ordained, and construed as remedial statutes in behalf of creditors, solely against a designated class of absconding or fraudulent traders. It was legislation in behalf of commerce and commercial credit. I confidently assert that the protection of the creditor was the principle upon which the English bankrupt system was inaugurated, and from which it never departed. That was the object and intendment of every English bankrupt statute from the time of the House of the Tudors, in 1442, to the House of Hanover, in 1774. I was therefore amazed to hear in this discussion the statement made that the prevention of fraud had nothing to do with a bankrupt law.

The preamble to the first bankrupt law ever enacted, and which passed in 35 Henry VIII, expressly recites:

Where divers and sundry persons, craftily obtaining into their hands great substance of other men's goods, do suddenly flee to parts unknown, or keep their houses, not minding to pay or restore to any their creditors their duties, but at their own will and pleasure consume debts and the substance obtained by credit of other men, for their own pleasure and delicate living, against all reason, equity, and good conscience: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c..

Can any doubt exist as to the object of this enactment, as remedial in its nature and intendment?

So, too, was the next bankrupt law in England, 13 Elizabeth, passed in 1570, which likewise recites:

Forasmuch as, notwithstanding the statute made against bankrupts in the thirty-fourth year of our late sovereign lord King Henry VIII, those kind of persons have and do still increase into great and excessive numbers, and are like more to do if some better provision be not made for the repression of them, and for a plain declaration to be made and set forth who is and ought to be taken and deemed for a bankrupt: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c.,

Can language be plainer, a purpose be clearer, as to the class of individuals who were within the policy of these two first English bankrupt laws? Who can doubt, who will assert that their sole object was not for the protection of creditors?

The next statute was that of James I, in 1604, the title of which is "An act for the creditors against such as shall become bankrupts." That act recites:

For the frauds and deceits, as new diseases, daily increase among such as live by buying and selling, to the hinderance of traffic and mutual commerce and to the general hurt of the realm, by such as willfully and wickedly become bankrupts, &c.

Still more distinct, still more specific, in its declaratory object. Solely for the creditor.

Then followed the act of 21 James I, in 1629, providing for the fraudulent conveyance of any part of their property to the value of £20.

Subsequently came the statutes of 4 and 5 Anne, passed in 1705, which recite:

Whereas many persons have, and do daily, become bankrupt, not so much by reason of losses and unavoidable misfortunes as to the intent to defraud and hinder their creditors of their just debts, &c.

Still remedial.

Then followed the statutes of the Georges down to the act of 4 George III, in 1764, in every one of which the remedy of the creditor against the fraudulent and absconding debtor is openly declared as the object of the enactment.

And as late as 1840, the commissioners appointed by her present majesty, Victoria, to inquire into the subject, in their report to both Houses of Parliament, said:

> We think that the interest of commerce requires that where a trader is unable to meet his engagements in the ordinary course of business, means should be afforded of compelling a division of his effects among his creditors as speedily and cheaply as possible.

Tedious as are these references to English bankrupt statutes, they abundantly sustain my position that they were passed solely in the interest of the creditor, and looked to his protection. If debtors were released, it was an incident in the execution of the statutes, and never as one of its objects.

Such was the state of the English system of bankruptcy when the Constitution of the United States was ratified. The framers of that instrument were well versed in that system of jurisprudence, and evidently understood the remedial character of the English bankrupt laws, and that they applied and were confined to persons who were traders, or who sought their living by buying and selling.

These wise and patriotic men clearly comprehended and thoroughly understood the remedial character and the limitations of the English bankrupt system as it existed in 1789.

With such knowledge the clause conferring on Congress the express power to pass this uniform system of bankrupt laws found a place in that great Federal bond which created our national Government. In the forty-second article of the Federalist Mr. Madison says:

> The power of establishing uniform laws of bankruptcy is so intimately connected with commerce, and will prevent so many frauds—

Mark the term, because a distinguished Senator during this debate insisted that frauds had nothing whatever to do with a bankrupt law—> will prevent so many frauds, when the parties or their property may lie or be removed into different States, that the expediency of it seems not likely to be drawn in question.

Nothing can be clearer than that Mr. Madison, who has been styled "the Father of the Constitution," looked to the bankrupt system as intimately connected with commerce, and that he by consenting to and advocating such a grant by the States to Congress of this executive power, looked to it as a statutory remedy against fraud and in the interest of creditors. No other logical deduction can be made as to his object; and such, I doubt not, was the intention of his coadjutors in the Convention.

It is a just deduction that the framers of that instrument consented to the ingrafting of this bankrupt clause into the Constitution with the same intent and object which prompted them to give to the Federal courts jurisdiction in certain cases arising in the States. They feared that the States themselves might pass statutes of homestead exemption delaying the collection of debts; they anticipated the contingency in which a man largely indebted in one State might go beyond its jurisdiction into another; and to avoid loss and inconvenience to the creditor, looking solely to, and intending to limit the power to merchants and traders, they ingrafted this power into the instrument of their hands, with the view and sole purpose of empowering Congress to legislate for the protection of the creditor against absconding and fraudulent debtors.

In support of this view we have the contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution. For eleven years after the adoption of that instrument no legislation ever was had and no attempt ever made by Congress to exercise the power of passing a bankrupt law.

Let me here ask the friends of this bill if the power conferred was to authorize Congress to release all unfortunate debtors from their obligations, by bankrupt enactments, why did not Congress at its first session propose some such remedy? Surely the occasion was never more needful for bankrupt statutes than immediately after the revolutionary war. Our fathers had returned with their garments still wet from the baptismal blood of a seven years' war, through which they had passed, with their property gone and their credit extinguished. Why should Congress with the power now claimed have failed to wipe out the debts of so gallant but so impoverished a people? Could legislation have been ever more just to that impoverished but heroic revolutionary host, who, with stout hands and a trust in God against a powerful foe, nobly achieved their and our independence? That occasion would seem to have been the most appropriate time, and the then halls of Congress the theater upon which the promptings of grateful and benevolent hearts would have inaugurated the enactment of the first bankrupt law. Why, if the Constitution conferred the power, were eleven years permitted to elapse without an effort to pass any bankrupt laws?

In 1800 the first bankrupt law was passed by Congress. It passed after long debate and earnest opposition. I have that law before me. It was, in the spirit of the English statutes, entirely remedial, looking wholly to the creditor—having no other purpose and no other object. It designated in precise and specific terms what constituted an act of bankruptcy. The first clause is:

> Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 1st day of June next, if any merchant, or other person residing within the United States, actually using the trade of merchandise, by buying and selling in gross, or by retail or dealing in exchange, or as a banker, broker, factor, underwriter, or marine insurer, shall, with intent unlawfully to delay or defend his or her creditors, depart from the State in which such person usually resides, or remain absent therefrom, or conceal himself or herself therein, or keep his or her house so that he or she cannot be taken, or served with process, or willingly or fraudulently procure him or herself to be arrested, or his or her lands, goods, money, or chattels to be attached, sequestered, or taken in execution, or shall secretly convey his or her goods out of his or her house, or conceal them to prevent their being taken in execution, or make, or cause to be made any fraudulent conveyance of his or her lands or chattels, or make or admit any false or fraudulent security, or evidence of debt, or being arrested for debt, or having surrendered him or herself in discharge of bail, shall remain in prison two months, or more, or escape therefrom, or whose lands or effects being attached by process issuing out of or returnable to any court of common law, shall not, within two months after written notice thereof, enter special bail and dissolve the same, or in districts in which attachments are not dissolved by the entry of special bail, being arrested for debt after his or her lands and effects, or any part thereof, have been attached for a debt or debts amounting to $1,000 or upwards, shall not, upon notice of such attachment, give sufficient security for the payment of what may be recovered in the suit in which he or she shall be arrested at or before the return day of the same, to be approved by the judge of the district, or some judge of the court out of which the process issued upon which he is arrested, or to which the same shall be returnable, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged a bankrupt: Provided, That no person shall be liable to a commission of bankruptcy, if the petition be not preferred, in manner hereinafter directed, within six months after the act of bankruptcy committed.

Then come the other clauses, simply providing in the most economical manner for the appointment of three commissioners, limiting the amount for which any creditor would be entitled to file his petition against his debtor, to have him involuntarily declared a bankrupt, to $1,000 in a single bill, or $1,500 if a partnership, or $2,000 if by more than two creditors. Such was the exact state of the bankrupt legislation of the American Congress in the year 1800. That act was limited to the term of five years, "and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer." And although this statute was wholly for creditors, and limited to fraudulent and absconding debtors, based as it will be seen on the English system of bankruptcy, so great was the popular indignation of the American people against the law, that Congress was compelled to repeal it in three years.

The next bankrupt law was passed at the memorable session of Congress which assembled in May, 1841. Among the measures proposed, as a part of the whig measures of the incoming whig administration, by a distinguished but now departed statesman from the State which I have the honor in part to represent, at that extra session of Congress, was a bankrupt law. Some Senators around me in this Chamber remember better than I do the angry collision which at that day the bare introduction of that measure produced. It was not only opposed on constitutional grounds, but upon the ground of demoralization, extravagance, and unwise and unnecessary legislation. The abuses and frauds which would inevitably attend its execution were described in bold and defiant terms. Although not strictly a party measure, its opponents were chiefly democrats. So great and indignant was the popular voice against this statute that its repeal was accomplished by the very Congress which enacted it. Could there be a stronger commentary against its unjust operation?

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] stated in this debate a few days ago that the great democratic leader of that day, then and always for thirty years the democratic leader in this Chamber, favored an involuntary bankrupt law. Never, sir. My friend from Ohio is mistaken. Mr. Benton, bold and defiant as he always was, was the first Senator to raise his voice for the repeal of the bankrupt act of 1841. He made three speeches against it. Let me read an extract from one. Said he:

> My great objection to this act is, not that it is, but that it is not, a bankrupt system. True, I am no friend to such a system; true, I have uniformly voted against it; true, my opinions about it are not changed.

Mr. Benton at all times opposed any bankrupt system; but on the occasion referred to by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] he did say that if the majority were bent on passing a bankrupt law, then he proposed an involuntary one, which should include corporations. He was in principle bitterly opposed to the whole system.

In further support of my position that the American people have never approved any bankrupt laws, I may cite the further reference to an effort made in 1820 or 1821 to pass a bankrupt law somewhat similar to that which had been passed in 1800. In that Congress was a gentleman (Mr. Rufus King) who had sat in the Convention which had framed the Constitution. When the bill was reported limited to merchants and traders, a Senator, I think from Delaware, (Mr. Vandyke,) proposed to amend by extending the operation of that act so as to allow any person confined under legal process in a civil suit to become a voluntary bankrupt. That amendment was opposed by Mr. Rufus King, of New-York, and also by Mr. Otis, of Massachusetts, who both denied the constitutional power of Congress to enact any bankrupt law which had for its object the release of debtors against the creditors' consent.

Mr. King said:

> That a bankrupt law applying peculiarly and solely to persons in trade was the only kind in the contemplation of the Constitution; that therefore the amendment would be exercising a power which, if not left to the States, did not reside in Congress and was unconstitutional.

This is clear, strong language from one of the framers of the Constitution.

From the repeal of the bankrupt law of 1841 no other attempt was made to pass a bankrupt law until the existing enactment of 1866.

Senators well know the circumstances under which that law was passed; it was the efflux of a civil war between the sections which drenched the land in blood and greatly exhausted the resources of our people. Senators have heard complaints of its oppression and the expenses attending its execution. If Senators desire to know what popular judgment on the law is, they have it reflected in the overwhelming vote by which the bill was passed by the House of Representatives totally repealing it. This is but another evidence of the unpopularity of bankrupt laws. That vote is a clear index of what the popular wish on this subject is.

But admit that I am in error, and that the constitutional power of Congress to enact a uniform system of bankrupt laws is not confined to mere remedial statutes for the benefit of the creditors against a certain designated class of these debtors. Still, I insist that no bankrupt law is likely to be passed which will not be extremely mischievous in its results to both creditor and debtor. Before doing so, I beg the Senate to pause and consider well whether the proposed amendments can possibly obviate the frauds and abuses which all parties admit have attended the execution of the present law. Let not appeals to your sympathy and benevolence blind your eyes to the abuses of any system of legislation. As a distinguished statesman once said in this Chamber, in opposing the exercise of this very power by Congress, remember "that benevolence is a private virtue, but justice is a public duty."

What evidence have the Senate that the proposed amendments in this bill will get rid of the fraud and corruption and the demoralization which have so far attended its execution? Touching some of these abuses we are not wholly without information. The experience of the operation of the system in England and this country is before us as a benefit to creditors. I read an extract from a late paper:

The comparatively small number of cases of settlement of insolvent estates under the English bankrupt law, which is perhaps as perfect as human ingenuity and long experience can make it, shows that such a mode of settlement is shunned whenever practicable. In the year 1871, according to the report of the British Comptroller of Bankruptcy, out of 10,242 insolvencies, there were only 1,242 bankruptcies, while there were 2,710 compositions with creditors, and 6,290 cases of liquidation by arrangement. In the bankruptcy cases the liabilities amounted to £3,974,767, and the assets to £554,770, or less than three shillings to the pound sterling. In the liquidations by arrangement the assets were 7*s.* 6*d.* per pound on the average, and in the compositions 6*s.* 3*d.* to the pound.

Let us look now to our own experience.

The Attorney-General of the United States has lately given us a written response to a resolution inquiring into certain details of the operations of the present bankrupt law. It is very imperfect, as he states. The resolution itself was imperfect in not requiring the ascertainment of a very important item of knowledge necessary to correct legislation on this difficult subject; and that is, taking the petitions filed in the whole United States together, what average pro rata dividend has been realized by the creditor from the debtor's assets? But the response gives us some information which is exceedingly important and exceedingly interesting, bearing on the costs of the bankrupt proceedings in the courts.

From March 2, 1867, to the 31st of December, 1867, out of 7,345 petitions filed there were only 230 petitions in involuntary bankruptcy. From the 1st of January, 1868, to the 31st of December, 1868, out of 29,539 petitions there were 443 for involuntary bankruptcy. From the 1st of January, 1869, to the 31st of December, 1869, out of 5,921 there were 527 cases of involuntary bankruptcy. Out of 4,301 petitions in 1870 there were but 884 petitions for involuntary bankruptcy filed, and in 1871, which is the period to which the information extends, out of 5,428 petitions filed there were 1,299 petitions for involuntary bankruptcy.

The whole number of petitions filed during the period named was 58,618, but only one twenty-fifth of them involuntary petitions.

I refer to this response to show that the great object for which all bankrupt law has been enacted or contemplated in England and acted upon in this country up to 1841 has been under this act a total failure. And now if we could reach the fact as to what amount of dividends has been paid from this very large number of applications for the benefit of this law, I undertake to say, from the experience I have had, and what I have heard, that the entire amount of assets in all the cases combined has not paid 15 per cent. on the amount of the claims.

But I tell you, sir, who have been benefited. The execution of this law has been prolific in a harvest of fees to the different officers who execute the law. By the response of the Attorney-General, the fees paid to the four classes of officers, including clerks, marshals, assignees, and registers, although he states that from many he has no returns and the statement is exceedingly incorrect, for the period to which I have alluded amounted to $4,821,784.40.

I am persuaded that this law is alike injurious to creditor and to many honest debtors. I believe better settlements could be made without it. Take one instance: a debtor is embarrassed; he has friends who are prompted to aid him by loans or indorsements. They desire to come to his rescue. They might do so and relieve him. But can they safely do so? Under this bankrupt law they would—the moment they hear that he is in failing circumstances—fly from him as if he had the plague. Why? Their natural benevolent feelings to aid him are checked and forbidden by the bankrupt law as it has been executed. An honest preference is avoided; all securities and guarantees set aside, his estate is surrendered and neither creditor nor debtor gets anything. While some of these amendments remove to some degree the injurious portion of the law, they do not reach all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the permission of my friend from Kentucky, I wish to suggest that the law as it now stands does not prevent a man who is in embarrassed circumstances from borrowing money on indorsement by sureties, if it is for a present consideration and not in regard to a transaction which has already turned out to be a failure.

Mr. STEVENSON. I said in my opening remarks that the amendments of this law proposed by the committee were to a certain extent a great improvement; but there can be no bankrupt law enacted which will not lead first to frauds on the part of debtors and to invalidating honest prior liens. Gentlemen say they guard against abuses by throwing restrictions around its operations. Where have such restrictions ever been successful? Clearly not. I might read pages of the failure of such efforts in England and such efforts here.

There is scarcely a Senator present who cannot bear testimony to the fraudulent practices and perjuries committed under this law. Human foresight has not been enabled to provide against them during a period of centuries, nor will these proposed amendments. I have heard a great deal about Shylock creditors. There are, no doubt, oppressive creditors everywhere, but what of fraudulent debtors? My limited experience is that there are twenty fraudulent debtors where you find one oppressive creditor; and I undertake to say that even the imperfect information presented to the Senate by the letter of the Attorney-General shows conclusively that they have been as twenty-five to one—twenty-five debtors seeking to wipe out their obligations to one creditor who has sought to put his debtor into bankruptcy.

Repeal this law: voluntary settlements and voluntary assignments will supply the remedy. I am sure, nine times out of ten—and the statement is sustained by the experience of England in the settlement of their bankrupt laws—any honest debtor can more readily make a better settlement with his creditors under State laws than under bankrupt laws, and thereby save the expense of going through this tedious Federal proceeding.

I am for leaving all insolvent settlements to laws and State agencies. They are ample to give relief. When fraudulent and unjust preferences are attempted, let the powers of the chancellors in the State courts be invoked, and you have an inexpensive and certain remedy. Stop the patronage and expense of the Federal courts acting in bankruptcy, leaving it to the States themselves, and, my word for it, you will find the business much more satisfactorily and speedily done and at one-twentieth the cost. Make the effort by repealing this law.

My friend from Ohio, in reply to the Senator from Illinois, said that it was too late to doubt the constitutional power of Congress to pass a bankrupt law. It may be that he is right. I know that he agrees with me in a desire to restrict Federal power, and that he would uphold the rights of the States in the exercise of their reserved rights on all occasions when it was right and proper to do so. His whole life bears testimony to his orthodox teachings and actings on the subject of restricting centralized power to the limits of the Constitution. But still I cannot agree with him that the clause giving to Congress the power to pass a uniform system of bankruptcy laws does necessarily include the right to pass such bankrupt laws as this. I cannot persuade myself that a voluntary discharge of debts without the creditors' assent is within the power of Congress. It is a violation of the obligation of a contract. I admit that the Supreme Court of the United States have held that it is. I say, however, to my friend from Ohio, that the grant to Congress to pass a uniform system of bankrupt laws is not conclusive; that the voluntary feature of this law as to retrospective obligations is not necessarily constitutional. If that were the true construction there is no limit to any power on the part of Congress. For instance, the Constitution gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce, but will the Senator from Ohio say that such a grant empowers Congress to build railroads in the several States against their consent, and control them under a commercial power as insisted upon by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON?] Under a general power to regulate commerce can Congress make the States mere hewers of wood and drawers of water? So, too, Congress has the power to coin money; but I put it to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] does that give to Congress the power to make paper money a legal tender for past debts? The Supreme Court, I know, have so decided it, and no Senator bows more willingly than I do to their decision; but my conviction remains unchanged that the ruling was both illogical and unsound.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They decided both ways, did they not?

Mr. STEVENSON. They have decided it both ways, and I regret to say that the last ruling is in my judgment the fallacious one. But that is the way that most courts do. [Laughter.] But the last exemplification of taking back decisions is in Louisiana, to which of course we are all expected to bow. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They said it was an exceptional case.

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, I never knew a court that desired to take back an opinion, that could not find an exception.

Mr. President, I only designed briefly to state why I should vote for the repeal of the existing bankrupt law. I have done so in a desultory and illogical way, and fear I have exhausted the patience of the Senate.

Let us repeal this law, and try the States for the relief sought.

From 1789 to 1800, when people were groaning under debt, we got along without it. From 1803 to 1867, save a few months in 1841, no bankrupt law was found necessary in despite of the crash of 1837. We have gone on advancing in power and in wealth. Let us leave to the States themselves the duty and the wise policy of attending to their own domestic affairs, by repealing a statute demoralizing in its effect, and immoral in its general tendency and operation.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I shall trouble the Senate with a very few remarks before the vote is finally taken on the passage of this bill; and they are more for the purpose of explaining my own position than for any other purpose.

I said, when the bill was taken up for consideration, that as between the present law and no law at all on the subject, I should favor no law at all, because in my judgment the present law is so oppressive, so unjust, and so impolitic, that it had better be wiped from the statute-book if no better law can be framed. But I said at the same time that as between a proper bankrupt law, such as is contemplated by the Constitution, and such as meets the approval of the enlightened judgment of those most competent to decide upon such a law, and no law at all, I was in favor of a proper bankrupt law.

But that decides very little; for what is a proper bankrupt law must be determined by a reference to each particular measure that is presented to Congress or to the country for consideration. You cannot lay down general rules that will determine with absolute infallibility what is a proper bankrupt law. It is a matter so practical in its character, that depends so much for its excellence upon its details as well as its general features, that no one can lay down a priori certain general rules or principles which will infallibly produce a perfect law. That being the case, when I say that I am in favor of a proper bankrupt law, I commit myself to no law that I have ever seen framed yet.

In reference to this particular law, or this proposition for a law that we now have before us, my position is simply this: When the bill came here from the House of Representatives, repealing the present law, it was my purpose to vote for that bill; and I should have contented myself with voting for that bill, as I had at a previous session of the Senate voted in committee to repeal the same law, had I not become perfectly convinced of that which is now apparent to every member of the Senate, that a large majority of the Senate are opposed to an absolute repeal of the law. Being perfectly convinced that a majority of the Senate are opposed to an absolute repeal of the law, obviously the next best thing to be done was to try to modify the law in such manner as to eliminate from it its most obnoxious features and make it as nearly perfect as our limited time would enable us to do.

Accordingly, I have devoted a great deal of time to this subject, not because of any love for a bankrupt law, not because of any partiality for such legislation, but because I hoped that I might be useful in changing the rigorous features of the present law, and making a law that would be more beneficial to both debtor and creditor and more satisfactory to the country. The fruits of our labors have been laid before the Senate, and have so far secured the approbation of the Senate; so much so, that the amendment to strike out the House bill and insert the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary has been adopted without a division.

Now, sir, I do not pretend to say that our bill is a perfect law. As I said on a previous occasion, no perfect law was ever made at a single heat. There is no statute, however short, that has been found to be perfect. Perfection is only reached by experience, and long experience; and it is not only possible, but it is altogether probable, that if the bill we now have under consideration shall become the law of the land, we shall find that it will require further amendment, further modification, further alteration, and possibly it may require to be repealed out and out. All we can say is that it is far better than the present law, and that as a majority of the Senate are opposed to repealing all bankrupt laws, as some bankrupt law is to exist according to the judgment of a majority of this body, this is the best law which we have been able to propose. But no one will claim for it perfection, and I am sure no one of the committee that proposed it feels that he is bound to stick to it through thick and thin, now and forever. I am quite sure that the members of the committee will be as ready as any other members of the Senate or anybody in the country, if experience shall prove that this bill will not answer the purpose they intend, will not prove beneficial to the country, to modify it still further or to repeal it out and out. At least those are my own views about it; and having at a previous session of the Senate voted in favor of repealing the law altogether, and having so declared myself in favor of repeal at this session of the Senate, some explanation seemed to be proper of why I had taken so much pains and performed so much labor to try to perfect this bill which is now under consideration by the Senate.

A few words, Mr. President, in reference to the general subject of bankrupt laws. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] that bankrupt laws in the United States are unpopular, and if I were seeking popularity I should clamor loudly for the repeal of the existing law out and out. My friend makes no clamor; he expresses the opinions of a life-time, frequently expressed before, against the existence of any bankrupt law at all; and in that he most truly represents the sentiments of the Commonwealth whose Senator he is. But, sir, something may be said upon the other side. We have had, it is true, two bankrupt laws that were but short-lived. The first was limited in the act itself to five years, and was repealed at the end of three years. It was an act passed entirely in the interest of the creditor class, and was extremely unpopular not only with the debtor class, but with that large and influential body of men, the lawyers of the country. One reason why bankrupt laws are unpopular is that nine-tenths of the legal profession are opposed to them, because the necessary effect of a bankrupt law is to lessen, to a very great extent, the emoluments derived from what is called the collection business of lawyers; and therefore we find in respect to this very law that almost all the petitions that have come to us for the repeal of the bankrupt law have been petitions printed by what is called the law association—I think that is the name of it—or the legal association; and in the letters sent to the lawyers, containing those petitions, and asking them to get signatures to them, it is put very distinctly upon the ground that the bankrupt law is prejudicial to the interests of the legal profession. And hence it has always been found, in this country at least, that the great body of the lawyers, who do so much to influence public opinion, to mold and to form it, have been opposed to a bankrupt law, and I suppose they ever will be opposed to any such law.

The act of 1841, however, was a very extraordinary change in the idea of a bankrupt law, and naturally encountered great opposition. As I said on a previous day in this debate, the great feature of the act of 1841, that which alone secured its passage, that which alone was demanded really, was the voluntary clause—the provision for voluntary bankruptcy. So far as the legislation of this country was concerned, and so far as British legislation was concerned, that was an entirely new feature in a bankrupt law; and it is not, therefore, to be wondered at that it encountered very great opposition, and that having performed the service the petitioners for it wished it to perform, having freed them from their liability, having procured discharges for them, the men who were ruined in the great commercial revulsion of 1837, having performed that office, and they no longer having an interest in the maintenance of the law, the popular opinion was sufficient to repeal it, even by the very same Congress by which it was enacted. There was nothing very strange in that.

But then in 1867 came the present bankrupt law, a law that couples the two features, the feature of the old English bankrupt law, a proceeding by a creditor against a fraudulent or a defaulting debtor, and also the voluntary part of the act of 1841. That law has remained on the statute-book now seven years, and no very great clamor had been raised against it until the commercial convulsion took place last fall. The panic of last fall directed attention to it; and the enormities perpetrated under it, and the oppressions that might be exercised under it, became so apparent that I think there was a very general outcry either for the repeal of the law or for its amendment. But after looking at all that has been said, so far as it has come under my observation, my impression is that the country has pretty generally settled down into the wish that we should attempt to modify and amend the law, rather than to absolutely repeal it.

It is said that the voluntary clause is unconstitutional. Suppose it were so, that would not militate against the bill that we have reported. The voluntary clause is in the existing law. The bill that we have reported does not deal with that clause, except in one or two particulars to amend and guard the provision of the law on that subject. But it is too late to argue that question, for although I agree that in regard to questions of interpretation of the Constitution we ought to be very reluctant to admit the doctrine of stare decisis—the doctrine that it has been so decided, and therefore must forever remain without review; although in regard to the interpretation of a constitution that is a principle which is to be adopted only after very long usage, very long and consistent interpretation of the instrument, so that the rights of the people become fixed according to that interpretation, yet it does seem to me that in view of the universal decision of the courts, State and Federal, sustaining this voluntary clause in the bankrupt act, it is too late for us to say that it is unconstitutional. Let us see how it is. More than one hundred thousand persons were discharged from their indebtedness under the provision for voluntary bankruptcy in the act of 1841. If that act was unconstitutional those discharges were not worth the paper they were written or printed upon. If it was unconstitutional the courts had no jurisdiction whatever to grant any such discharges, and therefore any creditor might sue such a discharged debtor, and if the law was unconstitutional his discharge would be no defense whatsoever against the suit. And yet the fact is that in no court, State or Federal, by no tribunal whatsoever, was that law held to be unconstitutional, but on the contrary those discharges were received in all courts, State and Federal, as complete bars to any action upon the indebtedness of the bankrupt existing prior to his discharge, and which was provable in the bankrupt proceedings, except those matters which by the act were excepted from its operation. Then it having been so decided a third of a century ago, those decisions never having been reversed, having been again and again ratified and affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, and Congress having acted upon them again in the passage of the act of 1867, it does seem to me that whatever may be our individual opinions, it is too late now to say that those voluntary provisions of the bankrupt law are not warranted by the Constitution of the United States.

Upon this branch of the subject, while I am on it, I wish to call the attention of Senators to a fact which sometimes has escaped their notice. Nothing is more common than to hear the Constitution of the United States quoted as if it contained the words "bankrupt law," from which it is inferred that it refers to some particular bankrupt law that existed in England at the time the Constitution was adopted. Why, Mr. President, the words "bankrupt law" are not in the Constitution of the United States at all. So far from there being any particular reference to a particular bankrupt law in existence when the Constitution was formed, the term "bankrupt law" is not to be found in the Constitution. What is the provision of the Constitution? The provision of the Constitution is:

The Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Not that they are bound to adopt any particular bankrupt law, but they shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. Now, what were bankruptcies? Does the Constitution confine us to what was "bankruptcy" under the system of English laws? Not at all. The framers of the Constitution were framing an instrument with reference to the experience of the whole world. They in no sense confined us—except where they used a particular technical term, like habeas corpus or the like, which is descriptive of an English writ—they in no instance confined us to the particular laws of the mother country of which we were once colonies. When they spoke, therefore, of "bankruptcies," they spoke not of bankruptcy simply as it existed in England, but bankruptcy as it existed in all commercial countries where the term was known, and that was every commercial country in the world. Bankrupt laws first had their origin in Italy, long before they were known in England, before they were known in France, before they were known in the Netherlands; but they were known in every commercial country at the time our Constitution was formed. When therefore the term was used, "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies," it was not used in reference to the particular English law, but in reference to the definition that that term might receive, not simply according to then existing statute law, but according to the nature of the thing and the exigencies that might arise.

Upon this point I might refer the Senate to what was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dartmouth College case. In answer to what is said that such a bankrupt law as is proposed was not within the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution, what I shall read from the opinion of the Chief Justice in the Dartmouth College case is directly applicable. In that case, speaking of the provision in the Constitution that forbids any State to impair the obligation of a contract, and considering whether or not the charter of a university was a contract within the meaning of that term in the Constitution, the Chief Justice said:

It is more than possible that the preservation of rights of this description was not particularly in the view of the framers of the Constitution when the clause under consideration was introduced into that instrument. It is probable that interferences of more frequent recurrence, to which the temptation was stronger, and of which the mischief was more extensive, constituted the great motive for imposing this restriction on the State Legislatures. But, although a particular and a rare case may not in itself be of sufficient magnitude to induce a rule, yet it must be governed by the rule when established, unless some plain and strong reason for excluding it can be given.

Now, I beg attention to these words particularly:

It is not enough to say that this particular case was not in the mind of the Convention when the article was framed, nor of the American people when it was adopted. It is necessary to go farther, and to say that, had this particular case been suggested, the language would have been so varied as to exclude it, or it would have been made a special exception. The case being within the words of the rule, must be within its operation likewise, unless there be something in the litrral construction so obviously absurd, or mischievous, or repugnant to the general spirit of the instrument as to justify those who expound the Constitution in making it an exception. (4 Wheaton's Reports, pp. 644, 645.)

Now, sir, apply that to this bill. The language of the Constitution is that Congress shall have power "to make uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." Now, say the Supreme Court, it is not sufficient that such a law as we now have before us may not have been particularly within the mind of the framers of the Constitution, or even of the American people, when they adopted that instrument; if the bill is within the language of the Constitution, and is consistent with the other provisions of the Constitution, is not repugnant to the letter or spirit of the Constitution, and is warranted expressly by its language, then the bill is constitutional, although that particular measure was not in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, or of the American people, when that instrument was adopted. It was upon that argument precisely that the voluntary clause in the bankrupt law was sustained by those who advocated it, that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, for the reasons which induced them to put that clause in the Constitution at all, to give Congress power to make uniform laws on the subject of men who failed in business, who were bankrupts, who were bankrupts in the most popular sense of the term, as well as in the technical sense of the term, men who attempted fraudulently to deprive their creditors of their rights, or who were unable to meet their obligations in the due and ordinary course of business, and that the whole subject being thus confided to the jurisdiction of Congress, it was no answer to say that this particular measure for such a class of cases, cases of bankruptcy, cases of individuals unable to meet their obligations in the ordinary course of business, was not in the contemplation of those who framed the Constitution of the United States.

I confess, sir, for myself, I thought then that too much force was given to that language of the Supreme Court, and that Congress did go too far, looking at it simply as a constitutional question, in adopting this voluntary clause in the bankrupt law of 1841. But, sir, I never did deny, because I could not deny, that there was great force in the reasons that were urged in favor of it and in favor of its constitutionality. But, as I said before, after an acquiescence of more than a third of a century, and after the affirmation of the constitutionality of the law by every court, State and Federal that ever has passed upon it, it is too late now to question its constitutionality.

There is another thing to be observed, Mr. President, that should make us a little reluctant to say that we will have no bankrupt law at all. My friend, the Senator from Kentucky, boldly avows his opposition to any bankrupt law whatsoever, and says that no one can be framed that will not do more injury than it will good. If that is the case, then we ought to have none. If no such law can be framed that will not be productive of more injury than good, then we ought not to have any. But we ought not hastily to conclude that no such law can be framed; for to conclude that, is to say that there is in the Constitution a power that should forever remain dormant. I do not think it was the idea of the framers of the Constitution that there should be any dormant powers in it. When they said to the Congress, "You shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," they meant that such a rule should be established; and when they said, "You shall have power to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," they did not mean that that power should be a nullity or that it should be dormant. They thought there were good and sufficient reasons for vesting it in you, and if they vested the power in you, they thought there would be a correlative duty upon you to exercise it—of course to exercise it wisely; and if it should so turn out, contrary to their expectations, that it could not be exercised at all without injury to the public and without doing injustice, then that extreme case, not foreseen by them, not contemplated by them, must prevent any law upon the subject at all. But once more I repeat, we ought not to be hasty in our conclusion that it is impossible to execute an express power of the Constitution without doing more harm than good.

Mr. President, these are all the remarks that I desire to submit, and perhaps some apology is necessary even for submitting them. I think that upon this question the minds of Senators are pretty well made up. The question now immediately before the Senate, I beg leave to remind Senators, is this: Shall the bill pass? The amendment of the committee has been agreed to; the bill has been read the third time, and the question is now, Shall the bill pass? So that the question on which Senators are now to vote is simply, will you have this bill which the committee has reported and which you have perfected by your amendments, or will you have the present law? If you vote "no" on the passage of this bill, you defeat the bill of the House, you defeat your own bill, and you leave the present law to stand as it is.

Mr. MORTON. Those who are in favor of the repeal of the law ought to have voted against the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly they ought.

Mr. MORTON. Now it is simply a question between the two bills.

Mr. THURMAN. Now it is simply a question between this bill and the present law. Those who vote "no" on the question which is now submitted to the Senate, vote to retain the present law in all its rigor and with all its enormities upon its head.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should have been glad, if the time had not been so long occupied in going on with this bill for four or five days, to close the debate with some general statements touching the principles of this bankrupt law, as we propose to make it stand, as affecting the commerce of the whole country, and as affecting the unity and prosperity of the nation. But as we have spent so much time upon the topic, for the sake of passing this bill now, amended and benefited and ameliorated as it is in such a way that I think it ought to be satisfactory to all sides of the controversy that has arisen about it, and in order that we may act with discretion upon the subject, and keep it upon the statute-book, and amend it again if it be necessary, I shall waive the right that, of course, I might have had to enlarge upon this topic, and only ask for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALCORN. I have risen, Mr. President, for the purpose of making a motion, if it is in order; but perhaps I am too late. The motion I desire to make is to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary was adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will have to reconsider first the vote on the third reading; otherwise you are not in order.

Mr. ALCORN. I desire to vote for the House bill, as a number of Senators do, and who were not aware until the honorable Senator from Ohio stated it awhile ago, that we are now in that condition that we have to vote for this bill or the law remains as it is. I have not been present all day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can accomplish his object by voting against this bill; and then he can introduce a bill himself for the total repeal, if he likes.

Mr. ALCORN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment of the committee in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not be in order. The Senator can move to reconsider the third reading, which will present the same question.

Mr. ALCORN. Then I move to reconsider the vote on the third reading; and then I can move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the motion to reconsider does not prevail, then, of course, the Senator cannot do it; but it tests the question of how many wish a total repeal and how many wish to make this national provision as good as they can to endure. A motion to reconsider the third reading will test the opinion of the Senate.

Mr. ALCORN. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate ordered the bill to be read the third time and the amendment to be engrossed; and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 40; as follows:
